For Comptroller of the Currency, $5,500; Deputy Comptroller, $3,500; Deputy Comptroller, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 20, to increase the total appropriation for office of the Comptroller of the Currency from $125,920 to $129,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 22, before the word "heads," to strike out "six" and insert "seven;" on page 58, line 1, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "twenty-nine;" in line 2, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-three;" in line 3, after the word "one," to insert "additional to one clerk of class 1 as disbursing clerk, $200;" in line 6, before the word "messengers," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" in line 7, before the word "assistant," to strike out "nineteen" and insert "eighteen;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five thousand nine hundred and sixty" and insert "twenty-eight thousand seven hundred and thirty," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: For Commissioner of Internal Revenue, $6,000; deputy commissioner, $4,000; deputy commissioner, $3,600; chemist, $2,500; one first assistant chemist, $1,800; one second assistant chemist, $1,600; one third assistant chemist, $1,400; one fourth assistant chemist, $1,200; two heads of divisions, at $2,500 each; seven heads of divisions, at $2,250 each; superintendent of stamp vault, $2,000; private secretary, $1,800; twenty-nine clerks of class 4; twenty-three clerks of class 3; thirty-six clerks of class 2; thirty-six clerks of class 1; additional to one clerk of class 1 as disbursing clerk, $200; thirty-one clerks, at $1,000 each; forty-four clerks at $900 each; three messengers; eighteen assistant messengers; and twenty laborers; in all, $328,730.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 24, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" in line 25, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" on page 59, in line 1, after the word "each," to strike out "one clerk, $900," and insert "two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger;" and in line 5, after the word "all," to strike out "forty-six thousand one hundred" and insert "fifty thousand six hundred and forty," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Life-Saving Service: For General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, $4,000, and $500 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent; assistant general superintendent, $2,500; principal clerk, $2,000; title and contract clerk, $2,000; topographer and hydrographer, $1,800; civil engineer, $1,800; draftsman, $1,500; four clerks of class 4; five clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; five clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; two assistant messengers; and one laborer; in all $50,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand;" in line 8, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" in line 10, before the word "clerks" to strike out "three" and in sert "four;" and in line 19, after the word "each," to strike out "one helper, $900" and insert "two helpers, at $900 each," so as to read:

Bureau of Engraving and Printing: For Director of Bureau, $5,000; Assistant Director, $3,500; accountant, $2,500; stenographer, $1,800; four clerks of class 3; nine clerks of class 2; nine clerks of class 1; seven clerks, at $1,000 each; disbursing agent, $2,400; storekeeper, $1,600; assistant storekeeper, $1,000; clerk in charge of purchases and supplies, $2,000; ten clerks, at $900 each; four clerks, at $840 each; eleven clerks, at $780 each; nine attendants, at $600 each; two helpers, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for Bureau of Engraving and Printing, on page 60, line 5, before the word "laborers," to strike out "seventy" and insert "seventy-five;" and in line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one hundred and ninety-four thousand one" and insert "two hundred thousand three," so as to read:

Seventy-five laborers, at $540 each; in all, $200,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 21, after the word "thousand," to insert "two hundred and fifty;" in line 22, after the word "dollars," to insert "principal clerk, who shall also perform the duties of law clerk, $2,000;" in line 24, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" and on page 62, line 5, after the word "all," to strike out "thirty-nine thousand seven hundred and eighty" and insert "forty thousand two hundred and thirty," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Surgeon-General of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service: For Surgeon-General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,250; principal clerk, who shall also perform the duties of law clerk, $2,000; two clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; private secretary to the Surgeon-General, $1,800; six clerks of class 2, one of whom shall be translator; six clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $900 each: one messenger; three assistant messengers; and two laborers, at $540 each; in all, $40,230.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 18, after the word "For," to insert "newspapers," so as to make the clause read:

For newspapers, newspaper clippings, law books, city directories, and other books of reference relating to the business of the Department, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which amount $8,500 shall be used for the rent of the Small Building," so as to make the clause read:

For rent of buildings, $47,566, of which amount $8,500 shall be used for the rent of the Small Building.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I desire to ask what the amendment, on page 63, in line 7, proposing to make an appropriation of $8,500 is for? Provision is made there that $8,500 shall be used for the rent of the Small Building. What is that building rented for?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That building is rented for the Treasury Department.

Mr. DOLLIVER. For what purpose?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know what particular branch of the Department, but I think a part of the Auditor's office.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am informed, Mr. President, that it is intended to house in the Small Building a body of clerks who are now housed in the main building of the Treasury Department. The Small Building is a fire trap, unfit for the purpose for which it has been rented, in my judgment, and I offer a substitute for the committee amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa proposes to amend the amendment of the committee. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, line 7, after the word "dollars," the Committee on Appropriations reported an amendment to insert "of which amount $8,500 shall be used for the rent of the Small Building." It is now proposed to substitute for those words the following:

No part of which shall be available for the rent of any building unless the Supervising Architect shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has investigated the same and finds it reasonably free from danger from fire.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I understand that it is the intention of the Treasury Department to move the offices of the Auditor for the State Department from the Treasury Building and house nearly a hundred clerks in what is known as the Small Building on Fourteenth street. The Small Building is four or five stories high, apparently a cheaply built structure, with narrow wooden stairways. It looks like a fire trap in every sense of the word, and for that reason a place unfit to put our civil servants at work. I think it ought to be brought to public attention that a very serious wrong is being done in renting unsuitable and ancient brick buildings in this town for the purpose of housing Government employees, when everybody knows that every day of their service in such a place they are under a constant threat of fire.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is it not also true that, by reason of the occupancy of this building, very important public documents and archives will be required to be kept there?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Undoubtedly, the accounts of the State Department are to be housed there. I will say further——

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that all the papers and documents of the State Department will be housed there?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not all the papers; but the papers relating to the accounts of the State Department with the Treasury Department.

I will add that the first floor of this building, which is a narrow, high building, is occupied as a flower store, and the four stories, which are probably not suitable to any other business, are worked off on the Government by somebody, at a rental of $8,500 a year, which would indicate a value of $250,000, when the building itself could be constructed for practically three years' rent.

The matter requires attention, and I have drawn attention to it by offering an amendment that no part of the money appropriated to the Treasury Department for the rent of buildings shall be available unless the Architect of the Treasury certifies to the Secretary that he has investigated the premises and finds them reasonably free from danger by fire. I would have said "a fireproof building," but I do not desire to embarrass the Treasury Department, because many of the buildings which it rents are for purposes that may not require so strict a standard as that; and yet it seems to me that it is little short of a crime to take a hundred young men and young women and place them in that building under the circumstances, and it certainly is a waste of money to pay $8,500 a year for a building like that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has evidently been misinformed. The committee, in providing for this building, is simply following an estimate duly made by the Secretary of the Treasury. I will send to the desk the estimate and a description of the building, and ask that they may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the Senator a question before those papers are read. Why is there specified in the bill the name of this particular building, and why is the Department limited to this particular building with reference to spending $8,500 of this appropriation and not with reference to spending for rent all the rest of the large amount appropriated? Why is the rental of this building legislated for?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is not an unusual thing. There are other places in this bill where the names of buildings are given; for instance, in the cases of the Mills Building, the Union Building, and others, the names are given, and a stated amount is appropriated for rooms in such buildings. In this particular case we followed the estimate as it was made, and I may say that we assumed that the Secretary of the Treasury had arranged practically for this building; that the tenants, as their terms expire, are refused renewal of leases with the expectation that Congress will provide, according to the estimate; that painting and other work is being done, etc.

As to the character of the building, I may say that the building was built especially strong; especially heavy and safe and fireproof, in order to accommodate the telephone headquarters, which formerly occupied it. I will not go further on that point just now, because the statement I have sent to the desk fully covers a description of the building.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Wyoming.

The Secretary proceeded to read the papers, which are as follows:

[House Document No. 354, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

ESTIMATE FOR RENT OF OFFICES OF AUDITOR FOR STATE AND OTHER DEPARTMENTS.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of offices for Auditor for State and other Departments. December 16, 1907, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 11, 1907.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the favorable consideration of Congress, an estimate of appropriation for rent of additional rooms for the use of this Department in the Small Building, southeast corner of Fourteenth and G streets NW., for offices of the Auditor for State and other Departments, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, $8,500.

Respectfully,
GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Estimates of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, by the chief clerk and superintendent, Treasury Department.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Contingent expenses, Treasury Department, rent:

Rent of building, namely—

For rent of the second, third, fourth, and fifth floors of the Small Building, southeast corner of Fourteenth and G streets NW., Washington, D. C., including light, heat, janitor, elevator service, and repairs, for offices of the Auditor for the State and other Departments (submitted), $8,500.

NOTE.—Estimate for remainder of fiscal year 1908 submitted in urgent deficiencies.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 28, 1908.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: An investigation of the sanitary conditions of the Treasury building reveals the fact that in the rooms occupied by clerks there is only an average of about 56 square feet of floor space available for use. This fact and the increasing business of the Department require that, in order to make room, the office of the Auditor for the State and Other Departments should be removed therefrom.

In the deficiency bill that is before the Congress at this time there has been provision made for eight or ten clerks and it is not known by the superintendent of the building where these clerks can be accommodated, without serious inconvenience to the working force in the divisions in which it is proposed to locate them.

A considerable increase is asked for in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1908, in the Treasurer's office, where the work is constantly increasing, owing to the enlarged output of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The redemption division is now very much overcrowded, as is also the issue division, where preparations are now being made for the installation of three new sealing presses to complete the issues of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. There is no place at this time where these presses can be placed.

A committee was recently appointed to reassign the rooms in the Treasury building, to make proper accommodations for the clerical and working forces in the event that the office of the Auditor for the State and other Departments was removed. This committee reported the plan of reassignment, which, if carried out, will leave in the Treasury building only two small rooms for future demands.

A careful investigation was made of all buildings that might be rented by the Department, and it was decided that the building at the corner of Fourteenth and G streets, known as the "Small Building," owing to its location, its construction, its rooms, and its general facilities, was best available for the purpose.

This building is considered by competent builders to be one of the best in the city. The walls are of brick and cement, are 2 feet thick at the first floor, and 18 inches thick at the fifth floor, while an ordinary five-story building would be 12 inches thick. The building is five stories in height, and it is desired to rent the second, third, fourth, and fifth floors, and one room in basement.

The interior is of thorough construction and is fireproof, having heavy iron beams throughout each floor, with 9-inch brick arches between beams laid in cement, with only a 5-foot span. There is also a brick will between the rooms and hall throughout the entire building up and under the roof, which is of the same beam construction as the brick arches.

Each floor consists of one room 8 by 16 feet and one large room 25 by 60 feet, extending the entire length of the building. The ceilings are 10 feet 9 inches high. There are toilets on each floor, consisting of three bowls and two urinals, with slop sink.

The present floor space occupied by the seventy-seven employees of the office of the Auditor for the State and other Departments is 5,742. The Small Building has approximately 7,600 square feet. Besides the space occupied by the office force there would be available over 1,800 square feet of filing space for the accommodation of papers.

One fact which deserves consideration in the contemplated removal of an office from the Treasury building is the space which can be provided for files. In moving former bureaus file cases in use had to be materially cut down and rearranged, because of the method of modern construction to make rooms with comparatively low ceilings. In the Small Building, the ceiling being 10 feet 9 inches high, very little cutting or rearranging will have to be made, and the furniture now used can be transferred and advantageously placed.

The owners of the building contemplate expending about $8,000 to place this building in the condition which the Treasury Department requires, by painting the entire interior, by putting in new plumbing throughout, a new elevator, new iron stairways, new tile floor in vestibule, new floors, new electric lighting facilities, and furnish light, heat, elevator, and janitor service. When the repairs are made the building will be as nearly fireproof as a building can be made.

Respectfully,
W. W. LUDLOW, Chief Clerk.

SMALL BUILDING, 7,570 SQUARE FEET.

The second, third, fourth, and fifth floors of the Small Building contain on each floor one small room 8 feet by 16 feet and one large room 25 feet by 60 feet, with two bay-window projections 5 feet by 11 feet, making 1,738 feet, or about 7,000 square feet on the four floors, besides a file room in the basement 22 feet by 28 feet, or 618 square feet, making a total of 7,576 square feet. Allowing 5,742 square feet of floor space to be occupied by the office of the Auditor for the State and other Departments, there would remain for the storage of files 1,200 square feet on the fifth floor and 624 square feet in the basement, a total of 1,818 square feet.

The bureau referred to is divided into three divisions, viz, miscellaneous, judicial, diplomatic and consular, with the following number of clerks: Miscellaneous, twenty-six; judicial, twenty-two; diplomatic and consular, twenty.

The miscellaneous division now occupies two rooms, No. 372½, on the third floor, twelve clerks, and fourteen clerks in room No. 451, fourth floor. The judicial division is in room No. 369. The diplomatic and consular divisions have clerks in three rooms—seven in room No. 378, eleven in No. 379, and two in No. 451.

The advantage of the large rooms in the Small Building is that each floor would accommodate a division, except one, which would have to be divided on account of the Auditor, deputy, and law clerk occupying part of one floor.

MARCH 10, 1908.

SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Pursuant to your verbal instructions, the undersigned has visited the Small Building, Fourteenth and G streets, with a view to determining its fireproofness.

The building has heavy exterior and interior brick walls supporting steel beams with brick floor arches sprung between bottom flanges of beams. Beam flanges are exposed, as are also numerous tie-rods. Window and door frames, interior trim, floor covering, etc., are of wood. Rafters and sheathing are of wood, with tin roofing. New first-story stairs are of metal and slate; second-story stairs and those above are of wood. Elevator shaft is of wood and open woven-wire grilling. Short runs of electric wires from outlet to present fixture locations are incased in wood conduits. Each story above the first has windows in the east wall. Similar conditions as to windows in south wall in top stories. A fire escape runs the height of the building on the G-street front.

It is to be noted that the owner is putting in new stairs, flooring, new plumbing, painting walls, varnishing woodwork, etc. Probably the present wooden stairs and elevator shaft inclosure will be replaced with more nonflammable materials. I am informed that metal frames and wired glass windows can be put into the east wall, or that, should the Government desire the property, anything will be done to improve the property which the Government may suggest.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
R. B. HAYES.

OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER COMMISSIONER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 11, 1908.

Mr. W. W. LUDLOW,
Chief Clerk Treasury Department.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 28th of January, 1908, I beg to say that an examination of the Small Building, southeast corner Fourteenth and G streets NW., shows same to be of fireproof construction, and of such structural stability as to be suitable for office purposes.

The apparent delay in answering your communication is due to the fact that it was found necessary to remove several of the floors of the building in order that a thorough examination could be made of all structural features.

Very respectfully,
JOHN P. HEALY,
Acting Inspector of Buildings.

Mr. WARREN (during the reading). I do not care for the further reading. However, it seemed to me but just, after the building had been attacked on the floor of the Senate and stated to be a fire trap, not fireproof, and so forth, that there should also be put in the RECORD a statement made by a committee which was appointed to investigate the building, together with report to Supervising Architect and report of inspector of buildings. I have no particular desire that the name of the building shall be included in the bill, but I do know it, personally, to be a desirable building and in no way such a building as my friend from Iowa has described.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If my friend the Senator from Wyoming will permit me——

Mr. WARREN. There was no pressure upon us to include name. We simply took the matter as it came to us from the Secretary of the Treasury in an estimate and inserted it as it came, just as we inserted the names of the Union Building and others.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then, what objection——

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to striking out the words "the Small Building;" but I did object to making a record here against the building of a good citizen of this city, which is not according to the facts as stated by those who have examined officially said building.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What, then, would be the objection to adding the suggestion of my amendment?

Mr. WARREN. I will say that it would be subject to the point of order. We are not legislating in the bill how the Government shall rent. We are simply providing the money. I will withdraw the name of the building and make the point of order against the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not think the point of order is good. The amendment is a mere limitation upon the expenditure.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has brought up the matter of insecure buildings. A few years ago I was one of a committee to examine and make report on the old part of the public printing building in the city, and the report of the subcommittee was unanimous that the building was unsafe, and that it was liable to collapse with the weight then in it. Yet there has been nothing done, and time and again when you, Mr. President, were chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and since have we tried to get the Senate and also the House to appropriate money to put up buildings suitable for the work and to subserve the convenience of the Government.

We are penny wise and pound foolish. This Government today is paying not less than 12 per cent on money invested by individuals in buildings to house the branches of the different Departments, when the Government can borrow all the money it wants at 2 per cent; and yet bill after bill is turned down for the reason, as claimed by Senators and Members of the House, that it is economy. It is foolish economy. There is not economy in it.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to say to my friend, the Senator from West Virginia, that we are paying $412,000 per annum for rented buildings in the city of Washington.

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SCOTT. I will be through in just a moment. I am in hopes that the discussion this morning will open the eyes of Senators to the condition, and that they will be more liberal in supporting the bills that come from the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, in order to house the different Departments of this Government in this great city of ours. It is an outrage that the Government acts as it does. Look at the Department of Justice, housed in an old hotel building on a side street, and other Departments all over the city in rented structures, when this great Government has a surplus of money and ought to provide buildings for the different Departments.

Mr. CULLOM. I will take the liberty of asking that the words in line 7, beginning with the word "of," to the end of the amendment be stricken out. It will leave the words "Small Building" entirely out of the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa insist upon his amendment?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, line 7, after the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert:

> No part of which shall be available for the rent of any building unless the Supervising Architect shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury he has investigated the same and finds it reasonably free from danger from fire.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the point of order, I think, will lie against the amendment. I simply propose to strike out the amendment which the committee made to the bill. I think the point of order made by the Senator from Wyoming against the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is good; and if it is, that disposes of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question will first come on the amendment to perfect the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not propose to perfect the amendment, but simply to strike out the words I have indicated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Illinois restate his proposition?

Mr. CULLOM. My proposition is to strike out, in line 7 of the bill, page 63, beginning with the word "of," the balance of that line and all of the next line, which leaves the words "Small Building" entirely out of the case.

Mr. WARREN. That is in line with perfecting the bill by the committee, which should first be taken care of.

Mr. TELLER. Has an order been entered to strike that out? If so, it leaves the amendment of the Senator from Iowa pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to striking out the committee amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I think it would embarrass the Treasury Department to put on the amendment which the Senator from Iowa has proposed, and I make the point of order against it that it is legislation. I do not know but that the point was made by the chairman of the committee. I think it was.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator from Wyoming made the point of order against the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have a ruling on that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. The insertion of the name of the building was entirely without request or application on the part of the owners of the building proposed to be rented. It was inserted merely upon the estimate as it came to the committee from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 67, line 19, after the word "each," to strike out "messenger, at $840" and insert "two messengers, at $840 each;" and in line 23, before the word "dollars," to insert "eight hundred and forty," so as to make the clause read:

> Office of assistant treasurer at Baltimore: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; three clerks, at $1,800 each; two clerks, at $1,600 each; four clerks, at $1,400 each; bookkeeper and three clerks, at $1,200 each; five clerks, at $1,000 each; two messengers, at $840 each; three watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $34,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 25, after the word "dollars" to strike out "chief clerk and paying teller, at $2,500 each," and insert "cashier, $3,000; paying teller, $2,500," so as to make the clause read:

> Office of assistant treasurer at Boston: For assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $3,000; paying teller, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 13, to increase the number of clerks at $1,000 each in the office of the assistant treasurer at Boston from eight to ten.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 18, to increase the total appropriation for office of assistant treasurer at Boston from $46,710 to $49,210.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item "Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago," on page 69, line 4, after the word "dollars" to insert "one chief coin, coupon, and currency clerk, at $1,750," and in line 6, before the word "coin," to strike out "four" and insert "three," so as to read:

> Assistant paying teller, $1,600; one chief coin, coupon, and currency clerk, at $1,750; three coin, coupon, and currency clerks, at $1,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 14, to increase the total appropriation for office of assistant treasurer at Chicago from $72,400 to $72,650.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred;" and in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-eight thousand eight hundred and ninety" and insert "twenty-nine thousand one hundred and forty," so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at New Orleans: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; chief clerk and cashier, $2,500; receiving teller, and paying teller, at $2,000 each; vault clerk, $1,800; two bookkeepers, at $1,500 each; coin clerk, $1,200; six clerks, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $1,000 each; porter and messenger, $500; day watchman, $720; night watchman, $720; typewriter and stenographer, $1,000; in all $29,140.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 74, line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "thirteen," so as to make the clause read:

For paper for interest, transfer, redemption, pension, and other checks and drafts for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurers, pension agents, disbursing officers, and others, $13,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 13, after the word "exceeding," to insert "two thousand," so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 118, line 16, after the word "dollars," to strike out "librarian of the law library of the General Land Office" and insert "clerk and librarian," so as to read:

One depositary acting for the Commissioner as receiver of public moneys, $2,000; clerk and librarian, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 118, line 19, to increase the total appropriation for the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office from $572,100 to $572,450.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, line 13, to increase the appropriation for separate State and Territorial maps, prepared in the General Land Office, from $1,250 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 121, to insert:

For continuing the work authorized by the act approved March 3, 1891, and for the protection of the lives of miners in the Territories and in the district of Alaska, and for conducting such investigations in the Territories and in the district of Alaska as will increase safety and efficiency in mining, to be immediately available, $195,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept for use in the investigations named above any site, buildings, equipment, or fund which in his judgment it may be proper to accept; such acceptance shall be reported to Congress, and shall not be considered as binding the Government of the United States beyond the appropriation made by Congress in any one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on page 121, line 24, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the principal bookkeeper from $1,800 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 122, line 17, to increase the total appropriation for the Indian Office from $221,270 to $221,470.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, on page 123, line 15, to increase the number of clerks of class 1 from 330 to 370.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 124, line 4, to increase the total appropriation for the office of the Commissioner of Pensions from $1,602,270 to $1,650,270.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the Patent Office, on page 125, line 8, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand;" in line 11, before the word "three," to strike out "two law clerks, at $2,500 each" and insert "two law examiners, at $2,750 each;" in line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" in line 15, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" in line 16, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" in line 17, before the word "dollars," to insert "four hundred;" in line 19, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one thousand eight" and insert "two thousand one;" in line 21, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "eight," and in line 22, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "five," so as to read:

Patent Office: For the Commissioner of Patents, $5,000; Assistant Commissioner, who shall perform such duties pertaining to the office of Commissioner as may be assigned to him by the Commissioner, $3,500; chief clerk, $3,000; 2 law examiners, at $2,750 each; 3 examiners-in-chief, at $3,000 each; examiner of interferences, $2,700; examiner of trade-marks and designs, $2,700; 42 principal examiners, at $2,700 each; 58 first assistant examiners, at $2,400 each; 68 second assistant examiners, at $2,100 each; 78 third assistant examiners, at $1,800 each; 100 fourth assistant examiners, at $1,500 each, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the Patent Office, on page 126, line 3, before the word "clerks," to strike out "ninety" and insert "one hundred;" in line 7, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eighty-five" and insert "one hundred;" in line 9, before the word "copyists," to strike out "one hundred and six" and insert "ninety;" and in the same line, before the word "copyists," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "sixty," so as to read:

Fifteen clerks of class 2; 100 clerks of class 1; skilled laborer, $1,200; 3 skilled draftsmen, at $1,200 each; 4 draftsmen, at $1,000 each; 100 clerks, at $1,000 each; messenger and property clerk, $1,000; 90 copyists; 60 copyists, at $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 126, line 20, to increase the total appropriation for the Patent Office from $1,131,310 to $1,194,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, line 15, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the Commissioner of Education from $3,500 to $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, line 5, to increase the total appropriation for the Bureau of Education from $55,500 to $56,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, line 9, to increase the appropriation for books for library, current educational periodicals, other current publications, etc., Bureau of Education, from $250 to $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, line 11, to increase the appropriation for collecting statistics for special reports and circulars of information, Bureau of Education, from $4,000 to $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, line 24, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred;" in line 25, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" on page 129, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight hundred and sixty-four" and insert "one thousand;" and in line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four thousand seven hundred and twenty-four" and insert "twenty-five thousand one hundred and sixty," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds: For Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,000; chief electrical engineer, $2,400; draftsman, $1,200; assistant draftsman, $800; one clerk, $1,500; stenographer and typewriter, $1,200; foreman, $1,500; compensation to disbursing clerk, $1,000; one messenger; person in charge of the heating of the Supreme Court and central portion of the Capitol, $1,000; laborer in charge of water-closets in central portion of the Capitol, $660; seven laborers for cleaning Rotunda, corridors, Dome, and old library portion of Capitol, at $660 each; two laborers in charge of public closets of the House of Representatives and in the terrace, at $720 each; in all, $25,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 24, to insert:

For rent of rooms in the Union Building for Patent Office model exhibit, $19,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 131, after line 4, to insert:

For rent of additional office accommodations for the Geological Survey in the main building of the Survey, Washington, D. C. (formerly occupied by the Reclamation Service), $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 131, after line 8, to insert:

For rent of additional rooms to building used by the Engraving and Printing Division, which will provide two large well-lighted rooms with a total floor space 5,200 square feet; these accommodations being demanded by the increased work of the plant, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is now in the Chamber, and he has given notice of his intention to speak to-day. I do not know whether he desires to speak now or whether he will wait until the appropriation bill is completed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to begin whenever the Senate is ready to yield me the time.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. This morning, when the routine morning business was completed, I inquired if the Senator from Wisconsin was present, as he had given notice that he desired to speak to-day. He was not here, and hence I called up the appropriation bill. It will be but a little while, I think, before the reading of the bill for action on the committee amendments will be completed. I will then be willing to allow the Senator to take the floor, if that course is agreeable to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to begin as soon as possible.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection. If the Senator desires to begin now, I will let the bill go over until after he gets through with his speech.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is very kind, and I shall be glad to begin at once, if the Senator will permit the bill under consideration to go over.

Mr. CULLOM. All right.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, what I have to say upon the pending bill is made more pertinent, if possible, by the unexpected announcement just now made by the chairman of the Finance Committee of the intention to amend it by striking out the provision for the use of railroad bonds as security for emergency currency.

The Aldrich bill in my view—and I use that term because the measure pending before the Senate bears the country over the name of its author—can not be fairly judged without considering the changes which have been wrought in the industrial and commercial life of this country within a decade, and the consequent changes that have taken place in banking within a few years.

It is to be expected that the remarkable industrial development of a country will induce corresponding growth in banking. To meet the increasing demand of expanding business new banks must be established, and established banks must make large additions to capital, surplus, and undivided profits. Such changes may be extraordinary, but they should be natural, measuring year by year the growing commercial development of the nation.

But something besides a normal growth of business and resulting demands upon our currency system requires attention in connection with this proposed legislation.

CONSOLIDATION OF BANKING AND "BIG BUSINESS."

Eighteen hundred and ninety-eight was the beginning of great industrial reorganization. Men directly engaged in production brought about in the first instance an association of the independent concerns which they had built up. These reorganizations were at the outset limited to those turning out finished products similar in kind. Within a period of three years following, 149 such reorganizations were effected with a total stock and bond capitalization of $3,784,000,000. In making these reorganizations the opportunity for a large paper capitalization offered too great a temptation to be resisted. This was but the first stage in the creation of fictitious wealth. The success of these organizations led quickly on to a consolidation of combined industries, until a mere handful of men controlled the industrial production of the country.

The opportunity to associate the reorganization of the industrial institutions of the country with banking capital presented itself. Such connections were a powerful aid to reorganization, and reorganization offered an unlimited field for speculation. It was a tremendous temptation.

It contributes nothing of value to this discussion to denounce individuals on the one hand or laud them on the other. I have compiled a list of about one hundred men with their directorships in the great corporate business enterprises of the United States. It furnishes indisputable proof of the community of interest that controls the industrial life of the country.

I shall ask, Mr. President, to have incorporated in the RECORD this list of about 100 men with their directorships. It discloses their connections with the transportation, the industrial, and the commercial life of the American people. This exhibit will make it clear to anyone that a small group of men hold in their hands the business of this country.

No student of the economic changes in recent years can escape the conclusion that the railroads, telegraph, shipping, cable, telephone, traction, express, mining, iron, steel, coal, oil, gas, electric light, cotton, copper, sugar, tobacco, agricultural implements, and the food products are completely controlled and mainly owned by these hundred men; that they have through reorganization multiplied their wealth almost beyond their own ability to know its amount with accuracy. It is not necessary to examine in detail the related events that have led to this marvelous concentration of business. The facts are well understood and generally recognized.

But the country seems not to understand how completely great banking institutions in the principal money centers have become bound up with the control of industrial institutions, nor the logical connection of this relationship to the financial depression which we have so recently suffered, nor the dangers which threaten us from this source in the future.

That there was a tendency on the part of the great banking associations to merge and combine could not be overlooked; and while financial and economic writers had directed public attention to the fact, and had even pointed out the opportunity and temptation for the use of this augmented power in connection with the promotion of the speculative side of business organization, they have been slow to believe that banking institutions could be so prostituted.

Nevertheless, most conservative authorities suggested and foreshadowed the dangers that unfortunately actually exist.

FINANCIAL BANKING RESPONSIBLE FOR MONEY STRINGENCY.

An English economist, writing in Littell's Living Age for December 26, 1906, concludes an analysis of the currency-reform programme proposed, respectively, by the committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce and the committee of the American Banking Association then under discussion, as follows:

Unfortunately, however, defective as the present currency system is, all the evils complained of are not due to its defects. In part they have resulted from the way in which the system has been worked. Thus the recent extreme stringency of money in New York would probably never have arisen if the banks, instead of preparing for the autumn demands, had not locked up their funds to far too great an extent in the financiering of Wall street. That the banks are to a large extent under the domination of the big financiers is well known, and the recent insurance investigations have shown how, under such domination, private interests may be made to prevail over those of the public.

The one thing that stands out most prominent, in my judgment, with reference to Wall street banking is the danger of the concentration of banking powers in the hands of a few great speculative interests. We have clearly defined tendencies in Wall street, the ultimate effect of which is likely to be the creation of two or three powerful groups of banks. There is, for example, the so-called "Standard Oil" group of banks, headed by the National City; there is the so-called "Morgan Life Insurance" group, with the National Bank of Commerce and the First National Bank at its head. These two groups contain many of the most powerful banks in New York City, and together account for a very large proportion of the total volume of credit at the disposal of the public. * * * The connection between the management of the banks in New York City and the great financial and speculative interests is very close, and if we ever have serious banking trouble it will come from this fact.

In an article on the "Concentration of banking interests in the United States," written in 1905, Charles J. Bullock, professor of economics, Williams College, says:

Unlike the central banks of other countries, our largest institutions are closely connected with various industrial interests, so that they do not occupy an independent position. Their policy is not controlled with sole regard for the general welfare of our banking system; but they have been drawn into vast enterprises, into promotion or reorganization, often of a speculative character, and have displayed less, not more, than ordinary conservatism. The National City Bank stood sponsor for the Amalgamated Copper Company, and the First National Bank has lent its aid to the various undertakings with which Mr. Morgan has been identified.

Mr. President, I shall later call the attention of the Senate to these two great groups of banks referred to by Mr. Bullock, which are every day increasing their control of the banking business of this country, Standard Oil at the head of one and Morgan at the head of the other. I should like the Senate to remember that this writer, speaking simply as a student of economics and finance, singles out the heads of these two groups to illustrate the dangers of the association of banks with industrial promotion and speculative enterprises.

Continuing, Professor Bullock says:

It is to be feared that our financiers have not yet learned the difference between banking and the promotion of companies—

In reading this, I need not suggest to Senators that Professor Bullock, being at the head of the economics department of an old renowned Massachusetts college, would certainly be very conservative in all that he might write—

It is to be feared that our financiers have not yet learned the difference between banking and the promotion of companies; but until this distinction is better understood, New York City will not rival London as an international financial center. * * *

The concentration of banking power has now proceeded so far that discussion has inevitably arisen concerning the length to which it will be carried, and the possible dangers of the movement. In the counting room and upon the streets New Yorkers are still pondering upon these questions, and not infrequently printed remarks are made about the "money trust." If this expression were heard only in the region of the one hundredth meridian, its interpretation would be obvious, but within the sacred precincts of Wall street such words can not fail to produce a certain impression.

Mark you, Mr. President, I am quoting from recognized authority, not upon present conditions, but upon the situation as it presented itself to students of government finance three or four or five years ago.

WALL STREET JOURNAL ON FINANCIAL BANKING.

As early as in 1903 the Wall Street Journal, in an editorial entitled "Evolution of a strong financial oligarchy," thus strongly set forth the dangerous tendencies in banking:

In the New York money market there are now seven great groups or chains of banks, trust companies, and insurance companies. These groups in some cases represent common ownership, and in others such an alliance of interests that the very institutions are controlled practically under a common policy. The tendency is for the large banks to control by ownership several smaller banks, and to be in close alliance with one or more trust companies.

After giving a classification of the different groups with the amount of loans outstanding, this editorial shows that there is a close bond of business interests among the groups, so that they are often operated together. It says:

The two insurance companies are, for instance, united in the Western National Bank. Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co. have affiliations with three of the groups, mainly that of the First National Bank, that of the Bank of Commerce, and, in a measure, that of the National City Bank. The Standard Oil Company is, of course, closely affiliated with the National City and the Hanover National groups. The seventh group, the largest in number of institutions though not in amount of loans, is the so-called "Morse group."

Let me say, Mr. President, that this described the beginning of bank consolidation. This editorial, written in 1903, speaks of seven organizations. There are far less to-day.

To return—and please note that I am still reading from the Wall Street Journal—

In many respects the evolution outlined in the foregoing features is more remarkable and perhaps more important than the great evolution in industrial finance of the past few years. It may be that the high organization of credit will tend to prevent panics in the time to come.

The Wall Street Journal was giving them the benefit of the doubt—

It may be that it will have quite the contrary result. In any event, it is clear that its effect for good or ill upon the destinies of those who are accustomed to use credit in their business will be very far-reaching.

Under the title "Perils of the money trust," the Wall street Journal again pointed out these dangers in the following language:

What is taking place is a concentration of banking that is not merely a normal growth, but a concentration that comes from combination, consolidation, and other methods employed to secure monopolistic power. Not only this, but this concentration has not been along the lines of commercial banking. The great banks of concentration are in close alliance with financial interests intimately connected with promotion of immense enterprises, many of them being largely speculative. The bank credits of the country are being rapidly concentrated in the hands of a few bankers who are more interested in banking on its financial (watered stock) side than in banking on its commercial side.

Such concentration as this is dangerous in a political sense. The people have already been greatly disturbed by the concentration that has taken place in the industrial world. * * * But concentration in the industrial world is a far less menacing condition than concentration in banking. The men or set of men who control the credits of the country control the country.

And if this concentration continues at the rapid rate with which it has progressed in the past ten years there will surely come a time when the people, alarmed at the growth, will rise up in some vigorous measures to assert their power. Such an uprising would involve the most serious consequences and would likely be carried to the most unreasonable limits. There can be no doubt that further concentration of banking power in New York is the end in view of some of our leading bankers. They believe that there will be a further reduction in the number of banks and a further increase in the power of the big banks. That is one reason why this banking concentration needs to be studied and its consequences carefully weighed.

But there is still another reason why this development in modern banking is open to criticism. It is largely a departure from commercial banking. It is turning the power over bank credits into financial (stock promotion) channels. So long as the country is prosperous no immediate danger may be apprehended from such a development as that. * * * But it is always the unexpected that happens, and our panics are commonly ushered in by some unforeseen calamity and it is a fair inquiry to make whether banking conducted on a "department-store" principle, with credits concentrated in a few great institutions, and with these institutions having large interests in financial and speculative enterprises, would be in a position in such a moment of unexpected calamity to do more than to protect the financial and speculative interests with which it is allied. In such a contingency, what protection would be left for the great commercial interests of the country?

Does that not sound like a prophecy for the times through which this country and its commercial interests have just passed?

GROWTH OF FINANCIAL BANKING.

The closeness of business association between Wall street and the centralized banking power of New York can, unfortunately, be but imperfectly traced through the official reports. It would seem that the radical changes taking place in the banking business of the country, suggesting to the conservative, economic, and financial authorities the gravest possible dangers to our industrial and commercial integrity, might well have caused the Treasury Department to recognize the necessity of so directing its investigations of the national banks in the greater cities which are centers of speculation and to so classify their returns as to inform itself and the country definitely respecting such changes. This has not been done. Financial and economic writers have long complained of the form of classification of credits in Government reports. Eminent students of finance have given warning of the dangers arising from too close association of combined banking interests with Wall street. The report of the Armstrong committee established the connection, and yet the classifications in the official report of condition of these banks remains mixed as to securities, so that investigation is made vastly more laborious and unsatisfactory, if not altogether baffled.

It is, however, possible to find evidence which establishes the diversion of a large volume of the bank resources to securities which are the subject of speculative operation in the stock exchange.

The ratio of the aggregate investment in "bonds, stocks, and other securities" (not including United States bonds) to the total individual deposits of the national banks increased from 7.2 per cent in 1890 to 16.2 per cent in 1907. The ratio of "stocks, bonds, securities, etc.," to capital, surplus, and undivided profits held by the national banks of the United States increased from 12 per cent in 1890 to 42.9 per cent in 1907.

Official figures do not show the real condition. The reports from banks upon which statistics are based fail to make clear the actual investment in speculative securities, not only through classification, but they fail for another reason. Banks secure information in advance that reports will be called for at a given time. Indeed, such notice comes to them through news dispatches from Washington direct. This gives an opportunity to sweep out and patch up and put the house in order, and the opportunity is not neglected. There is another reason why the actual holdings of banks in such securities are not shown in more recent reports. These banks have either established connections with trust companies or have organized inside trust companies as a protection and convenience. The bank and trust company, though differently officered, will be found closely welded together in their directorates. These companies afford a convenient cover for the banks in many ways. Their securities can be borrowed and shuffled back and forth to make a good showing. The trust companies can handle securities which the banks can not touch. They can underwrite bonds and float loans for which the banks could not openly stand sponsor. They can deal with themselves in innumerable ways to their own benefit and the detriment of the public.

As the interests represented by the great banks use their customers, so they use to a less degree the various State, private, and savings banks which they control. The growth of financial banking appears even more marked when all classes of financial institutions are taken together. The ratio of stock and bond investments of national, State, private, and savings banks and trust companies to their total individual deposits, as shown by the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, has increased from 8.9 per cent in 1890 to 28.2 per cent in 1907. The total holdings by advance and trust companies in these stocks and bonds, exclusive of United States bonds, amounted in 1907 to over $3,690,000,000. By reliable estimate, based on extensive investigation by an independent New York banking house, to which I shall have occasion to refer a little later, the holdings of the banks and trust companies were three years ago almost a billion dollars in railroad bonds alone.

The effect of the proposed legislation becomes more apparent as we investigate the grouping together of the great financial institutions holding these railroad bonds and other special securities and then trace their connection with the companies issuing these bonds.

Mr. President, the bare names of the directors of two great bank groups—the Standard Oil group and the Morgan group—given in connection with their other business associations is all the evidence that need be offered of the absolute community of interest between banks, railroads, and all the great industries.

There are twenty-three directors of the National City Bank (Standard Oil). There are thirty-nine directors of the National Bank of Commerce (Morgan). Examination of these directorates shows that the two groups are being knit together in business associations, suggesting their ultimate unification.

Subject to personal differences which may arise between powerful individuals of these different groups, resulting in occasional collision, they are practically a monopoly, and as far as the public is concerned, practically one group. The business partner of the head of the Morgan group is found on the directorate of the chief financial institution which heads the Standard Oil group. And one of the leading directors of the National City Bank (Standard Oil) is a member of the board of directors of the principal financial institution in the Morgan group.

The directors of the leading organizations comprising the two principal groups are bound together in mutual interest as shareholders in the various industrial concerns which have been financed by one or the other of these groups in recent years.

Remember that these sixty-two men who are directors of the two banks standing at the head of the two great groups are not additional to the list of less than 100 men to whom I have referred as controlling the industrial life of the nation, but a most important part of it.

LIST OF MEN WHO CONTROL INDUSTRIAL, FRANCHISE, TRANSPORTATION, AND FINANCIAL BUSINESS OF THE UNITED STATES, WITH THEIR DIRECTORSHIPS AND OFFICES IN VARIOUS CORPORATIONS.

The list includes directors of the two great banks at the head of the Standard Oil and Morgan groups and fifty other names.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The twenty-three directors of the National City Bank, the head of the Standard Oil group, and the directors of the National Bank of Commerce, thirty-nine in number, hold 1,007 directorships on the great transportation, industrial, and commercial institutions of this country.

Let me go a step further with respect to the Standard Oil bank in order to show how this mighty power that dominates the life of the American people to-day—and I will ultimately show its relation to the bill which has been reported here—notwithstanding the dexterous withdrawal of the proposition to incorporate railroad bonds into our currency system——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I certainly do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I, of course, do not like to take up the time of the Senator from Wisconsin, but he may not be aware of the fact, and therefore I think perhaps I had better make the suggestion at this time. Among the first suggestions of opposition to this bill and the most earnest objection was that made by the National City Bank, of the city of New York, and Mr. Vanderlip, its vice-president, did at that time and has continuously since opposed the measure. This measure is opposed not only by the National City Bank of New York, but by all the banks in the city of New York.

I have before me, received this morning, a statement made by the chairman of the New York Clearing-House Association, saying it is better to have no legislation at all than to pass this bill, and stating the reasons why we should have a currency based upon the assets of the banks, and the reasons why he is in favor of a bill that is pending elsewhere. I know of no bank or bank man who is in favor of this bill. The fact is that the banks throughout the country are against it; and the Senator from Wisconsin has studied this situation to little effect if he has not found that out.

POWERS BEHIND THE LEGISLATION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee what is the position of Mr. Morgan upon this proposition?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know what Mr. Morgan's position is, but I do know that Mr. Morgan is a man of wide experience, a man of patriotism and of wise judgment, and I should feel highly gratified if I thought Mr. Morgan approved this bill in all its features.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, perhaps in some indirect way the chairman of the Committee on Finance will be able to find out where Mr. Morgan stands. But his beaming countenance from the galleries of this Chamber while the Senator from Rhode Island was making his speech would rather indicate that Mr. Morgan, the head of one of these great groups, was not entirely adverse to the propositions embraced in this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Wisconsin and every other Senator will agree with me that this proposition should be discussed upon its merits and be judged by what it is and what it proposes to do and not by the opinion of Mr. Morgan or anybody else as to the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me say to the Senator from Rhode Island that you can not always tell the merits of a proposition solely from the printed lines. I shall show before I have finished that the withdrawal of the railroad-bond feature of this bill throws a flood of light over the intent and purpose of this legislation.

Let me say to the Senator from Rhode Island, further, that it is not impossible to conceive that this great organization which is controlling the industrial and commercial life of the American people, which is engineered and directed by the best intellects in America, might put out here and there newspaper interviews to make it appear if possible that there is no organized power behind this legislation.

I do not know Mr. Vanderlip, to whom attention has been called by the Senator from Rhode Island. He may be a most eminently fair man. I do know that he has given public expression to the fact that he is not in accord with this legislation. I do know that he is vice-president of the National City Bank. I do know that he is in favor of a central bank, and I do know that some other men connected with these great institutions are. Mr. President, there might be a choice. I can conceive that there may be more than one way in which the organized money power of this country can be strengthened. A central-bank system might be quite as useful, perhaps more useful, than the legislation proposed by this bill.

But I think the Senator from Rhode Island will have to do more than cite a few names to disprove the evidence which I shall present before I conclude showing that these few men whom I have named dominate and control the business and industrial life of this country against the interest of the great mass of the people, and that the effect of this legislation, if enacted, will be to build up and strengthen and fortify this mighty power at the expense of the people.

CONNECTIONS OF NATIONAL CITY DIRECTORS.

But let me revert to the directorate of the National City Bank, remembering that there are twenty-three directors.

Fourteen of the directors of the National City Bank are at the head of fourteen great combinations representing 38 per cent of the capitalization of all the industrial trusts of the country.

The railroad lines represented on the board of this one bank cover the country like a network. Chief among them are the Lackawanna, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, the Union Pacific, the Alton, the Missouri Pacific, the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, the Chicago and Northwestern, the Rock Island, the Denver and Rio Grande, the Mexican National, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Northern Pacific, the New York Central, the Texas and Pacific, the Erie, the New York, New Haven and Hartford, the Delaware and Hudson, the Illinois Central, the Manhattan Elevated of New York City, and the rapid-transit lines of Brooklyn. These same twenty-three directors, through their various connections, represent more than 350 other banks, trust companies, railroads, and industrial corporations, with an aggregate capitalization of more than twelve thousand million dollars.

That is a part only of what is behind the directorate of the National City Bank of New York, the head of only one of these groups.

RESERVES ARE MASSED IN NEW YORK.

It was inevitable that this massing of banking power should attract to itself the resources of other banks throughout the country. Capital attracts capital. It inspires confidence. It appeals to the imagination. Added to this the forces back of these controlling groups could offer tempting interest rates and, finally, the Federal legislation would almost seem to have been enacted to augment this power.

The law providing that 15 per cent of the deposits of a country bank should be held for the protection of its depositors conveniently permits three-fifths of the amount to be deposited in reserve city banks, and of the 25 per cent of reserve for the protection of depositors in reserve city banks one-half may be deposited with central reserve city banks. As there are but three central reserve cities, one of which, of course, is New York City, the alluring interest rates which these all-powerful groups could offer inevitably tended to draw the great proportion of lawful reserves subject to transfer from the country and reserve banks.

Consider the number of country banks for which these larger banks are the approved reserve agents, and the way the system has been worked to gather up the money of the country by these big group banks can be understood. One Standard Oil bank is approved agent to receive deposits of lawful money reserves from 1,071 national banks scattered over the country. Another bank of the same group receives reserve deposits from 1,802 country banks, and another from 478. A leading Morgan group bank receives deposits from 909 outside banks, and another from 615, and still another from 1,233.

The system has been operated to gather constantly increasing millions, belonging to the depositors of other banks throughout the country, into the great national banks of New York.

In 1896 the Treasury Department began publishing the abstract of the condition of national banks in circular form five times a year. This statement shows the amounts due from the national banks of New York City to the other financial institutions of the country. From the date of the first circular, December 17, 1896, to the last report, February 14, 1908, the net balance due from New York City national banks to other national banks of the country had increased from $115,756,274 to $232,960,362, an increase of $117,204,088, or more than 100 per cent.

The power which the New York banks derive through these vast accumulations of the resources of other national banks strengthen their position so that they could draw in the surplus money of all the other financial institutions of the country, State, private, and savings banks and trust companies. The growth in the net balance due these institutions from the New York national banks in recent years is even more astounding than the increase of their deposits from the other national banks. Beginning with $58,461,256 in 1896, it grew to $227,088,130 in 1908, almost a fourfold increase. The net balance which the national banks of New York owed all the other financial institutions of the country increased in the same period of time from $174,217,530 to $460,048,493.

On August 22, 1907, the last call before the panic, the New York banks owed the other banks of the country a net balance of over $410,000,000. The report for December 3 shows a reduction of the balance to about three hundred and eighty-eight and a half million. With all the pressure that they could bring to bear on New York national banks, the other banks of the country were unable to withdraw in time of great need more than about twenty and a half millions, or about 5 per cent of their deposits in New York. They would have been unable to withdraw even this amount had not the Treasury increased United States deposits in the national banks of New York during this period over $47,000,000.

EVIDENCE OF SPECULATION BY BANKS.

The ability of these group banks of New York through their connected interests to engage in underwriting, to finance promotion schemes, where the profits resulting from overcapitalization represent hundreds of millions of dollars, places them beyond let or hindrance from competitors elsewhere in the country. Their ability to take advantage of conditions in Wall street, even if they did not create these conditions, forcing interest rates on call loans as high as 150 per cent, would enable them to command, almost at will, the capital of the country for these speculative purposes.

But one result could follow. Floating the stocks and bonds in overcapitalized transportation, traction, mining, and industrial organizations does not create wealth, but it does absorb capital. Through the agency of these great groups hundreds of millions of dollars of the wealth of the country have been tied up. Other hundreds of millions have been drawn upon to supply these great speculating groups in their steadily increasing Wall street business.

Direct evidence of the speculative character of banking in Wall street, not only by those houses which are familiarly recognized as speculative houses, but of the speculative banking which is done by national banks, is contained in the testimony of George S. Baker, president of the First National Bank of New York City, which was given before the Armstrong committee September 14, 1905. I shall refer to the banking connections of Mr. Baker later. The Armstrong committee secured the testimony of Mr. Baker for the reason that he was at that time a member of the directorate of the Mutual Life Insurance Company and of the finance committee of that organization. He was at the same time president and a member of the board of directors of the First National Bank of New York City.

I have traced this afternoon in what I have had to say the centralization of the industrial, transportation, and commercial business of the country. I have shown its relation to bank concentration. Now, Mr. President, I shall show from official records the relation of the control of these great banks to speculation in Wall street.

I quote from Mr. Baker's testimony, beginning on page 624 of the Armstrong report:

Q. Now, Mr. Baker, we all appreciate your position in the community and the value of your opinion on such matters as these, and we would be very glad to hear what you have to say as to the advisability of an insurance company going into syndicate operations.—A. Well, it generally enables the insurance company to get bonds at a cheaper price than it otherwise could.

Q. That would be the only justification?—A. I think that is the only thing that occurs to my mind now.

Q. Is it necessary for an insurance company, with the funds at its command to such an extent as the Mutual Life Insurance Company, to take bonds through syndicates? Couldn't it get them directly at ground-floor prices?—A. I don't believe they could, sir.

Q. Suppose it were known that the Mutual Life and the Equitable Life and the New York Life would take bonds directly from the railroad companies that wanted to borrow money, don't you suppose they could get as advantageous a price as they could through any banking house?—A. If it was a small issue, I think they could; but the recent issues you were speaking of—the Pennsylvania three-hundred-million loan—those three companies wouldn't want to take so large a block as the bankers could take.

Q. And, of course, if the bankers undertook the flotation they would want to control the entire issue?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it would be to the interests of the railroad company to make an arrangement satisfactory to the bankers?—A. They always seem to think so.

Q. The effect would be that the bankers would get the control of the issue, and then to get in, the insurance companies would have to deal with the bankers?—A. Practically.

It is to be borne in mind that in this transaction the bank controls the bond syndicate. It is to be borne in mind that the bank president of the national bank is alos one of the finance committee of the insurance company to be dealt with.

Q. That is about the way it usually is, isn't it?—A. Yes, sir. And the bankers generally let the insurance companies in on what might be called the hardpan business.

Q. They let them in if there is an original syndicate, afterwards a purchasing syndicate on the original syndicate basis?—A. That is a thing governed by the banks.

They might let them in and they might not. They are trading with themselves. The bankers are running this syndicate to get the profit out of it. They are on the official boards of the insurance companies with which they are dealing.

Q. The bankers consider it will help the flotation if institutions having a reputation for conservatism would help the thing by taking a large block?—A. I don't think they would let them in it if they didn't.

The whole transaction is shown to be, by the admissions of this witness, one of which self-interest is the controlling thing; and remember, Mr. President, that this witness is one of the custodians of the funds of a great national bank. He was asked by the examiner whether the relation of the Mutual Life Insurance Company to the matter did not enter into his thoughts at all. His answer was, "Not in the slightest degree."

To quote further from the testimony:

Q. In other words, it is an aid to the flotation to have a subscription from an insurance company, isn't it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It is a large help to the dealings between the bankers and other investors; it helps them on the public offerings?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then, when they are put on the public offerings and the insurance companies buy at the issue price, that is a great help to the market, isn't it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, the question has been mooted of late, although it apparently a little while back didn't receive any attention, as to the participation of those who deal with the mutual life insurance companies and refunds of other companies in syndicate operations that sell for their own benefit. You have heard practically the question that I have put to the other gentlemen upon the stand. Have you been a participator yourself in the syndicate?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In syndicates in which the Mutual Life was also a participator?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did that in any way affect your judgment on any matter coming before you as a trustee of the Mutual Life?—A. Well, that came to me entirely through my business with the First National Bank, and never had any connections, either directly or indirectly, in any way, shape, or manner, with the Mutual Life.

Q. I see. You, as an officer of the First National Bank, were in a position to know of the syndicates and to get opportunities in syndicates?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the relation of the Mutual Life Insurance Company to the matter didn't enter into your thought at all?—A. Not to the slightest degree.

Q. At the same time the fact remained that you and the Mutual Life Insurance Company were participators in several syndicates together?—A. I presume that is the fact.

Mr. Baker later furnished a list of the syndicates in which he personally participated, and in which also the Mutual Life Insurance Company was a participant. The value of this testimony lies in the fact that it gives clear and unmistakable proof that the First National Bank was in the speculative market. It is followed immediately in the Armstrong report by the testimony of Frederick Cromwell, the treasurer of the Mutual Life Insurance Company. He says:

You were asking me, Mr. Hughes—I heard you asking them, and I think you did me—whether it was necessary to buy bonds of these syndicates or whether we could not buy them from the railroad company. I think it is wise for me to say this—perhaps it is saying too much—that a few years ago I was convinced that we could buy of the railroad company. We had a peculiar relation with some of them, and were large stockholders, but I found it impossible. I might as well mention one instance. I went to my personal friend, Mr. Stuyvesant Fish. We had at that time four of their directors on our board. I said to Mr. Fish, "See here; this thing can not go along any further; it is time for us to buy our bonds of you directly——

Q. You are talking now of the Illinois Central?—A. Yes; the Illinois Central, and he said he could not afford to sell the Mutual Life bonds, and I could see the justice of his remark when he explained it, that it was a necessity for his railroad to do their business through banks en bloc, it could not afford to take them to single buyers, and he must keep up his associations with the bank.

Q. So the railroads must keep in with the banks in order to float their bonds?—A. They have to; yes, sir.

Q. And the insurance companies must keep in with the banks in order to get the investments they want at low prices?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So the banks control the situation?—A. There is no question about it. I went once to the St. Paul Railroad and remonstrated very much because they had made an issue and did not let me know first, and I got a reply which was not at all satisfactory. You can understand their reasons. I can, at any rate. And I say that to defend my statement that we had to buy through the syndicate.

Q. What do you think their reason is?—A. To keep a market for the bonds. An attempt was made two or three years ago by the Pennsylvania Railroad to make a large flotation through its stockholders, and there never was, for its size, such a lamentable failure, and they went around with their hats in their hands to Kuhn, Loeb & Co. and Speyer & Co., and they put the enterprise through.

Mr. Baker's and Mr. Cromwell's apparent innocence of anything wrong in these transactions is perhaps more significant than the transactions themselves. The absence of any sense of business responsibility or of business integrity is more appalling than conscious and willful violation of the business standards of honorable men.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will it interrupt the Senator to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Purely for information, as the Senator knows. Is it the Senator's position that the national banks ought not to be permitted to invest in any securities at all?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am attempting, let me say to the Senator from Indiana, to present to the Senate the conditions actually as they exist—what the remedies may be is a matter for further discussion. I believe that the evidence is overwhelming of the connection of certain great bank groups, in which the greatest national banks of this country are a dominant power, with industrial and transportation combinations, the securities of which under this bill were to be made a basis of issuing circulating notes. I believe that the development of these connections and this relationship is a very important matter in the consideration of this legislation. Surely a national bank ought not to be allowed to underwrite or invest in securities of corporations in which the officers and directors of the bank are primarily interested and when the transactions are primarily for the benefit of such officers and directors, or others who may control them, and not for the benefit of stockholders or depositors of the bank.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall not interrupt the Senator further. He is making a very lucid and powerful statement upon precisely the point he makes. The question did occur to my mind right in that connection, because it is a subject of considerable dispute as to whether banks ought to be permitted to invest in these securities at all, on the one hand, or whether, upon the other hand, they should be confined to receiving deposits and loaning them. I merely wanted to ask the Senator as to whether he had arrived at any conclusion at all on that point, and then I would follow it up by one or two other questions. But I will not interrupt the Senator. I will let the Senator go on with his statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say that the question suggested by the Senator will receive some further attention later on in my remarks.

Mr. President, the relationship between the legislation pending and the discussion which I am attempting to make focuses itself just at this point, that the control of these great banks is in the hands of these men who are interested in a speculative way in corporate securities and who, at the same time, are the custodians of the deposits, not only of individual depositors, but the deposits of reserve money of the banks all over the country.

BANKERS IN THE ALTON DEAL.

The Chicago and Alton deal is an instance of the participation by the men in charge of New York's great financial and trust institutions in Wall street flotation and stock-jobbing schemes. In that instance Mr. Harriman, as stated in his testimony a year ago before the Interstate Commerce Commission, got together three New York bank officers and directors, Mr. Mortimer Schiff, Mr. George J. Gould, and Mr. James Stillman, and organized a syndicate to acquire the stock of the Chicago and Alton Railroad.

Mr. Mortimer Schiff, of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., was a director of the Mercantile Trust Company, of the Provident Loan Association, and the United States Loan and Trust Company, one of the principal Standard Oil financial institutions. George J. Gould, the director of the National Bank of Commerce, the great Morgan institution, and James Stillman, the financier of the Standard Oil institutions, the president of the National City and the director of the Bank of the Metropolis, Bowery Savings Bank, Columbia Park, Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, the Fidelity Bank, the Fifth Avenue Safe Deposit Company, the Hanover National Bank, the Lincoln National Bank, the National Butchers and Drovers' Bank, the New York Trust Company, the Riggs National Bank of Washington, the Second National Bank of New York, and a member of the clearing house committee of the New York Clearing House Association. These, with Mr. Harriman, were members of a syndicate.

The syndicate was successful, and these gentlemen became, in the words of Mr. Harriman, "The Chicago and Alton Railroad." When they got control of the property the capital stock was $22,000,000 and bonded debt about eight and a half millions. They mortgaged the property and issued about $40,000,000 of bonds. As officers of the Chicago and Alton Railroad they sold these bonds to themselves at 65 cents on the dollar. Then as individuals they turned about and sold the bonds at a profit of about $300 apiece, principally to insurance companies and trust institutions which they controlled. Of the amount realized to the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company on the sale of the bonds Messrs. Harriman, Stillman et al. paid about seven millions to themselves, under the name of a 30 per cent dividend to stockholders.

Mr. Harriman sought to justify these operations before the Commission by pointing out that the previous management had made extensive improvements out of income. I quote from the testimony:

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that from year to year, during the management of the prior Chicago and Alton, whatever had been charged against its income and spent upon the road had been closed each year by the board of directors?

Mr. HARRIMAN. I presume so, but under the former management the Chicago and Alton was drying up very fast, and so was the railroad itself.

Mr. KELLOGG. It certainly has not dried up since.

Mr. HARRIMAN. No, sir; it has not.

Mr. KELLOGG. There was water enough to satisfy anybody.

Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes; and business enough to satisfy.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would you think distributing $6,669,000 as a 30 per cent dividend to the stockholders, who had already had 8 per cent, would prevent it from drying up?

Mr. HARRIMAN. Combined with the other methods of financing which were adopted by the Chicago and Alton; yes.

The bonds issued out of these nefarious manipulations were made eligible for deposit to secure Government deposits.

Although the railroad-bond proposition has disappeared for the time being, I pause just a moment to repeat that the bonds growing out of these nefarious manipulations are not only eligible but large amounts of them have been accepted and placed in the Treasury to secure deposits of Government money. They are first-mortgage bonds, legal for savings bank investment in New York and Massachusetts. They would be eligible to secure circulation under this bill, as the bill stood and was contended for by its friends up to almost the present moment, as soon as the dividends could be fixed up. They are first-mortgage bonds at the rate of about $85,000 per mile, or about three times the average value of railroad property in the country.

FINANCIAL BANKING SUPPLANTING COMMERCIAL BANKING.

The plain truth is that legitimate commercial banking is being eaten up by financial banking. The greatest banks of the financial center of the country have ceased to be agents of commerce and have become primarily agencies of promotion and speculation. By merging the largest banks, trust companies, and insurance companies masses of capital have been brought under one management, to be employed not as the servant of commerce, but as its master; not to supply legitimate business and to facilitate exchange, but to subordinate the commercial demands of the country upon the banks to call loans in Wall street and to finance industrial organizations, always speculative, and often unlawful in character. Trained men, who a dozen years ago stood first among the bankers of the world as heads of the greatest banks of New York City, are, in the main, either displaced or do the bidding of men who are not bankers, but masters of organization.

The banks which were then managed by bankers as independent commercial institutions are now owned in groups by a few men, whose principal interests are in railroads, traction, telegraph, cable, shipping, iron and steel, copper, coal, oil, gas, insurance, etc.

This subversion of banking by alliance with promotion and stock speculation is easily traced.

There was every inducement for those who controlled transportation and a few great basic industries to achieve control of money in the financial center of the country.

The centralization of the banking power in New York City would not only open the way for financing the reorganization and consolidation of industrial enterprises and of public utilities throughout the country, but would place those in authority where they could control the markets on stocks and bonds almost at will.

With this enormous concentration of business it is possible to create, artificially, periods of prosperity and periods of panic. Prices can be lowered or advanced at the will of the "System." When the farmer must move his crops a scarcity of money may be created and prices lowered. When the crop passes into the control of the speculator the artificial stringency may be relieved and prices advanced, and the illegitimate profit raked off the agricultural industry may be pocketed in Wall street.

If an effort is made to compel any one of these great "Interests" to obey the law, it is easy for them to enter into a conspiracy to destroy whoever may be responsible for the undertaking.

STORY OF THE PANIC.

I have placed before you the record evidence that less than one hundred men own and control railroads, traction, shipping, cable, telegraph, telephone, express, mining, coal, oil, gas, electric light, copper, cotton, sugar, tobacco, agricultural implements, and the food products, as well as banking and insurance. Does anyone question the overcapitalization of these consolidated corporations which cover the business of the country? Does anyone doubt the community of interest that binds these men together? Does anyone question their vital interest in maintaining their overcapitalization and protecting their stocks and bonds? Does anyone doubt their hostility to the declared policies of President Roosevelt, and the progressive movement throughout the country, and their readiness, nay, their determination, to make an end of it at any cost? Was this not made abundantly manifest during the summer of 1907? The White House was not far wrong when it gave out the information that a great fund had been pledged to block any third-term possibility.

To get the true perspective of more recent events, let us go back a little. If we would find the underlying cause for the convulsions that have taken place on the stock exchange, culminating in this demand for emergency currency and the acceptance of railway bonds as a basis for currency issue, follow the operations of these men and the great groups they have formed as traced in Wall street for the last three years. It is a blending of the control of business and legislation and politics.

In 1904 these financial groups joined in a big bull movement upon the stock markets. They had forced expansion in business everywhere. Their reorganization schemes had been repeated until the trading public was intoxicated with speculation. None of the sensational disclosures through investigations by committees and departments through the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the courts had yet taken place. Expansion was in the air. It was "good hunting." The times were right for a "great killing." The bull movement was carried through 1904 and into 1905 with great success. The call loans on Wall street collateral, nearly all of which were handled by group banks, reached high-water mark. But some of the lesser individuals fell into squabbles over the control and spoils of the Equitable Life Insurance Company. The fight waxed hot and reckless, and the country was startled with the revelations. The scandal spread. It involved the Equitable Life, the Mutual Life, the New York Life, the banks of the Morgan group, and banks of the Standard Oil group. Morgan and his associates made furious effort to suppress investigation, but the public demand forced it upon Governor Higgins, and the Armstrong committee began its work. It disclosed the relations existing between insurance companies and banks and railroads and industrial organizations, and the use of hundreds of millions of money held in trust upon which the big men of the big groups, bankers and all, were drawing, in violation of every principle of honesty in the administration of trust funds.

The effect of these disclosures upon the stock market could not be averted, though the good offices of the Treasury Department were sought and, to some extent, secured. There was scurrying to and fro.

Nineteen hundred and six had been ushered in. President Roosevelt was pressing upon Congress for railway rate legislation, urging that the wrongful aggressions of capital be curbed, urging his Department of Justice to prosecute violators of the law, announcing the novel doctrine that criminal statutes were for the rich as well as the poor, and throughout the country an awakened public conscience demanded an honest administration of the corporations controlling business and a release of the capital and surplus of the nation by the great controlling groups. The master organizations put forth all their efforts to stay the downward trend in Wall street and to stimulate a lagging market.

This is history, Mr. President. They forced dividend payments. They made them extravagant. The Baltimore and Ohio, the Pennsylvania, the Santa Fe, the New York Central, the Union Pacific, the other companies declared dividends lavishly. It was not so difficult. The traffic of the country paid for it all. The stock market responded and stocks took new high records. Determined to outface appearances, the groups ordered a new issue of stocks. In the last half of 1906 not less than $500,000,000 of railway stocks alone were thrown upon the market, dividend issues keeping step with stock issues. It was designed to betoken a carnival of prosperity. It was expected that the country investors would respond in the old way and their money be drawn into this financial center to prop it up. But the public did not come in. Railroad securities had fallen into disrepute. Watered when the roads were built, watered when they were merged into systems, watered again when the systems were grouped, railroad stocks and bonds were regarded by the public with a suspicion bordering on contempt. Morgan and Rockefeller and Harriman and Hill were almost daily making some new move in the great game, but the public had one answer: "It is water; more water."

Finally, in the early part of 1907, the foreign markets showing distrust in our securities, the resources of trust companies and banks likewise showing the strain, the deposit bill of March 4, 1907, was crowded through this body in the closing days of the last session, furnishing the money of the Government free of interest to the national banks. It was not a drop in the bucket. Stocks had to go down. The market collapse of March, 1907, came with a smash. Union Pacific dropped $40,000,000 in a single day. Reading, Amalgamated Copper, and Steel followed. Says one financial writer, in two days "stocks traded in on Wall street shrunk more than $1,800,000,000. What this means may be understood from the fact that it is equal to the value of the entire export trade of the United States in 1906."

But the country was prosperous. Its tremendous power of production, distribution, and consumption was again demonstrated. Credit readjusted itself. Commercial transactions took their accustomed way. The banks, engaged in what may well be termed "legitimate banking," resumed normal relations to commerce and trade.

In the meantime Wall street had been thinking. The loss of public support was a revelation to its financial bankers, underwriters, promoters, industrial chiefs, and brokers. But they had learned their lesson. It was burned into them as with a hot iron that the kind of business which they were conducting had forfeited the confidence of the country; that there must be new sources of money supply for critical periods in their operations, or their operations must cease. Not that the stock exchange has not its legitimate function in the business of the country. That is one thing. Conscienceless promotion schemes in which are employed the trust funds of banks and insurance companies to consolidate and control the industrial, transportation, and banking business of the country is another. And it is one of the perils of the high finance which has taken possession of business that once expansion and overcapitalization had been wildly indulged those in control dared not call a halt. They have climbed too high to hazard a stop or a look back, much less to undertake to reach a solid business basis.

But inflation and speculation must have its money supply. The country had refused further support. There was one thing left. The Public Treasury—the last desperate recourse. The want of elasticity in the currency system of the country was seized upon as a scapegoat and as a means to an end.

Mr. President, our currency system has its faults. Want of elasticity is one of them. But no currency system which any enlightened nation ever provided was invested with an elasticity which would, at the same time, be safe for current commercial demands and meet the inflation of values and the chicanery of financial banking to which the country had been treated for nearly ten years. Why, sir, in half that time securities were authorized approaching seven thousand millions, nearly one-third of which was authorized in 1907.

But it was necessary to prepare the country for such a scheme as fitted the requirements of the special interests represented in the great central groups of New York banks, trust companies, transportation companies, and independent organizations. The country must be given a shock. Country banks must be made to feel the pinch. The interests were angry. They had suffered from agitation, from investigation, and were otherwise humiliated. They had been fined, and other cases were pending. The President had spoken at Indianapolis, and it was evident that something respecting railway valuation was in his mind.' The situation warranted, nay, demanded, extreme treatment.

Sir, can any sane man doubt the power of a little group of men in whose hands are lodged the control of the railroads and the industries, outside of agriculture, as well as the great banks, insurance, and trust companies of the principal money center of the country, to give commercial banking and general business a shock at will? Having the power, did they not have reasons (purely selfish reasons, it is true), but reasons sufficient to cause them to exercise that power in their own interest? They could even turn it to their advantage financially. From 1904 to 1906 the interests had disposed of enough stocks at artificially created prices to make it profitable to drop these same stocks and bonds still lower, taking them in finally at a profit to themselves. Owning the controlling interest of their own securities, prices are largely a matter of manipulation. They can be lowered and raised at will, damaging only the outsider who is caught "long" or "short" for the time being.

Taking the general conditions of the country. it is difficult to find any sufficient reason outside of manipulation for the extraordinary panic of October, 1907. It is true that earthquake and war had destroyed some of the wealth of the world. But look for a moment at the general business condition of this country.

The agricultural production of 1907 was a little less than 1906, but the prices were better. The farm value of the total crop of 1907 exceeded that of the previous year by $482,739,929.

The year's business for the United States Steel Corporation was larger in 1907 than any other year in its history.

The operating railroads of the country reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission showed an increase in net earnings for 1907 over 1906, amounting to $260,147,835, an increase in net earnings per mile of $239.

The balance of trade was with us. The excess of exports over 1907 was over $500,000,000.

Five hundred and sixteen national banks were organized for the year ending October 31, 1907, as against 455 for 1906.

The deposits in all banks aggregated $13,099,635,348, an increase over 1906 of $883,867,682. The gain in deposits of 1907 over 1906 was greater than for 1906 over 1905.

August 22, 1907, the aggregate of national-bank capital was $896,451,314, the highest point ever reached in the history of national banks.

The total amount of cash held by all banks reporting in June, 1906, was in round numbers one thousand million; in 1907 it was eleven hundred million, a gain for 1907 in round numbers of $100,000,000.

The total number of State, private, national bank, and trust company failures in 1904 was 122; in 1905, 79; in 1906, 45; in 1907, 41.

There were no commercial reasons for a panic. There were speculative, legislative, and political reasons why a panic might serve special interests. There were business scores to settle. There was legislation to be blocked and a currency measure suited to the system to be secured. There was a third term to be disposed of and policies to be discredited.

A panic came. I believe that it needs only to be followed step by step to show that it was planned and executed, in so far as such a proceeding is subject to control, after once in motion. Such a statement without support in facts warranting it would deserve condemnation. To withhold such a statement, to shrink from plain speech setting forth the facts in so far as they can be uncovered in the discussion of this legislation would be to shirk a plain public duty.

Mr. President, I will join in no denunciation of any honest business, whether conducted in Wall street or elsewhere. Neither will I forbear to present and discuss facts relative to speculation in Wall street, because it may be criticised as abuse for political reasons. The operations of Wall street, the greatest banking and money center in the Western Hemisphere which influences national credit, puts the national banking business of the country on the verge of financial demoralization, threatens to stampede Congress and force lopsided emergency legislation, ought to be closely scanned and fairly and fearlessly discussed.

On the one hand, no authority has been able to assign more than vague reasons for a financial panic in October, 1907. On the other hand, in the midst of general prosperity, increasing bank deposits, increasing bank capitalization, diminishing bank failures, increasing railroad business, increasing production of pig iron, that unfailing barometer of business vitality, Mr. Hill announces that it will soon be necessary for the Government to lend its credit to railway companies; President Ripley, of the Atchison, predicts approaching business disaster and deprecates investment in States traveled by his lines; the vice-president of the New York Central declares that "no man of ordinary prudence would for a moment think of investing money in a business (railways) against which every man's hand from the President's down seems to be raised." This is but a sample of the prophecies of evil which may be gleaned from the pages of midsummer magazines and periodicals. Newspaper interviews with prominent railway officials designed to intimidate appeared here and there over the country from day to day. Subordinate railway officials and station agents looked solemn. Business was good. Trains were crowded, but something was "wrong." From the big manufacturer it reaches the smaller manufacturer. It began to be felt among the merchants, and commercial travelers were heard denouncing the President and all assaults upon property. The bank deposits were increasing, but the stock markets were bad.

The panic came. It had been scheduled to arrive. The way had been prepared. Those who were directing it were not the men to miss anything in their way as it advanced. It is worth while in following the progress of the panic at this point to recall the admonitions of Professor Bullock, Mr. Woodlock, Mr. Pratt, and other economic and financial authorities of the consequences which might result from concentration of banking power coupled with speculation and possible collusion.

For a few years there had been developing a minor financial group, now known as the "Heinze-Morse-Thomas group." It consisted of twelve banks and two trust companies, a consolidated steamship company, the Heinze United Copper Company, with his banking connections in New York and Butte, Mont. Compared with the Standard Oil and Morgan groups it was a small factor. But its steamship company was encroaching on Morgan's New York, New Haven and Hartford road in the coastwise traffic, and Heinze in a running fight had forced Standard Oil to buy him off at a cost reported at $10,000,000. Morgan was ready to show an affectionate interest in Morse, and Standard Oil was quietly lying in wait for Heinze. It all fitted together like a piece of mosaic. They could discipline the country, arrest further railway legislation, State and national, discredit Roosevelt, dispose of a third term, prepare Congress for emergency legislation, put Consolidated Shipping out of business, and pick up Heinze and United Copper on the way. Morse and Heinze were caught between the big groups.

Suddenly, in the first days of October, somebody (to use a Wall street phrase) began to "smash United Copper on the curb." The stock broke badly. Standard Oil was getting under way. Doubtless, never suspecting the source, Heinze, through his brother, a member of the stock exchange, and through brokers, bought and bought until United Copper went out of sight, carrying down Heinze's brother, one firm of his brokers, and involving the Morse-Heinze banks in the crash. Up to this point the panic had been well in hand, but with the revelations following hard upon clearing-house investigations, it slipped its bridle, and the situation assumed a serious aspect. But not for one moment did Morgan or Standard Oil miss the opportunity offered. Morse and Heinze were forced out. They were compelled to reorganize their directorships and substitute semi-dependent Standard Oil men as their successors. They were forced to sell their stocks for what they could get. Morgan attacked Morse's Consolidated Steamship Company stocks and bonds, and Morse was ultimately forced to surrender his steamship company combine, which he did. They went after the Knickerbocker Trust Company, Charles T. Barney, president, and close ally of Morse's. It was charged in New York that the interests deliberately started a run on the Knickerbocker. Morgan was appealed to for aid. Morgan, whose plaudits have been sounded here in this Chamber, was in a position to follow carefully every step and phase of this proceeding. In the first place, Mr. Morgan gave out, as reported in Wall street, that the Knickerbocker would be supported if it met the demands of the depositors who had started a run upon it. There was nothing in subsequent events to indicate that there was any sincerity in that promise, but an analysis of every step is convincing to the contrary. Support was not given; it was withheld. After the company, relying upon that pledge, had paid out millions, it was forced to close its doors, and Barney went to a suicide's grave. Barney was likewise a director in the Trust Company of America, a comparatively new institution, with a few System directors, giving the great groups a semi-interest in the institution, though they have not yet taken it over. The raid on Heinze, Morse, Barney, et al., and the latter's directorate connections with the Trust Company of America, caused public suspicion to fall upon it. A strong run was started. This was not on the programme, but as the Vanderbilts, allies of the Standard Oil, were represented on the directorate of the Trust Company of America, Standard Oil was bound to offer some assistance. Though gold and bank notes were ostentatiously piled on the counters to impress depositors, and young Vanderbilt offered as an exhibit of resources and placed at the teller's window, the excited depositors persisted in demanding their money. Its distant relationship to the group was sufficient to save it in the end.

Conferences over the inside condition of this trust company, however, gave Morgan, owing to his group connections, information that the control of Tennessee Coal and Iron—stock control and pool stock—had been placed with the Trust Company of America by John W. Gates and his associates. In a Wall street panic there is always big game to be bagged. That is one of the uses of a panic. Morgan seized the opportunity for United States Steel. Standard Oil interests were identical with Morgan's interests in this, and he made it a condition of saving the Trust Company of America, that Gates and the Tennessee Coal and Iron pool sell to him at his price or the Trust Company of America should go on the rocks. The surrender was complete. United States Steel took over Tennessee Coal and Iron, thereby tightening its grip upon the most precious of all the national resources of the country. It was bad for the country, but the trust company was saved and Morgan was glorified.

The Westinghouse Company's experience affords another striking illustration of the useful purposes of a well-managed panic. Westinghouse was in the way of Standard Oil's General Electric. Members of the boards of directors of the Standard Oil banks were in a position to exert some influence at the critical moment most harmful to Westinghouse, and he went to the wall.

The panic was working well. The stock market had gone to smash. Harriman was buying back Union Pacific shorts, but still smashing the market. Morgan was buying in short steel stocks and bonds, but still smashing the market. The Morse group had been disposed of. Standard Oil had settled with Heinze. The Consolidated Steamship Company had surrendered to Morgan, and at the same time the interests were disciplining the people. The country banks were begging for their balances. Business was being held up. It was reported that the President had concluded to revise his message to Congress. Railway valuation would be "dropped or so modified as to be harmless." On the street and in the brokers' offices the strain of apprehension was intense. In the midst of a Wall street fight, when fear supersedes reason, it is difficult for those who are in it, but not directing it, to determine how much is real, how much is sham. Some of the guns are loaded only with blank cartridges to alarm; some are loaded with powder and ball to kill. The press set it all forth as it appeared on the surface. It portrayed the great financiers hurrying to and fro, setting a prop here, a prop there, holding midnight meetings in Morgan's library, seeking some way to avert the calamity that threatened prosperity and a nation's honor. It was a thrilling picture, but it was false. The reporters were not invited to the conferences of the inner circles where sat the men who controlled not only the great banking organizations of New York, but the transportation and business of the country, the men who were behind the panic and would stay its progress when it had served its purpose.

But the panic must be given a fitting finale, a dramatic finish.

Standard Oil had suffered a series of mortifying experiences and exposures that were beginning to tell upon the iron nerves of the men who for half a lifetime had seemed utterly hardened and indifferent to public condemnation.

Morgan and others had come out of the United States Steel bond-and-stock-conversion-performance, and the insurance scandals, badly scarred. Both Standard Oil and Mrogan were much in need of redemption with the general public. It would be a great stroke of business to wind this panic up with these gentlemen as the saviors of public credit. A carefully elaborated climax, with Morgan and the Standrad Oilers as the central figures would invest them with a halo of self-sacrifice and public spirit almost sublime.

The floor of the stock exchange was chosen as the scene for the closing act, October 24 the time.

The men who had created the money stringency, who had absorbed the surplus capital of the country with promotions and reorganization schemes, who had deliberately forced a panic and frightened many innocent depositors to aid them by hoarding, who had held up the country banks by lawlessly refusing to return their deposits, never lost sight of one of the chief objects to be attained. The cause of currency revision was not neglected for one moment. It was printed day by day in their press; it passed from mouth to mouth. The phenomenal interest rates were impressing the public in a way never to be forgotten. High interest rates should be made to plead for emergency money through the telegraph dispatches of October 24 in every countinghouse, factory, and shop in America. The banks refused credit to old customers—all business to new customers. Call loans for money were at last denied at any price. This put operators caught short or long on the rack. It spelled ruin.

For the first time since the panic began 11.30 a. m. arrived with everybody on the floor of the stock exchange wildly seeking money at any price. Interest rates which had for several days ranged from 20 to 50 per cent began to climb higher. Settlement must be made before 3 o'clock. Money must be forthcoming, or the close of the business day would see Wall street a mass of ruins and banks and trust companies on the brink of collapse.

How perfect the stage setting! How real it all seemed! But back of the scenes Morgan and Stillman were in conference. They had made their representations at Washington. They knew when the next installment of aid would reach New York. They knew just how much it would be. They awaited its arrival and deposit. Thereupon they pooled an equal amount. But they held it. They waited. Interest rates soared. Wall street was driven to a frenzy. Two o'clock came, and interest rates ran to 150 per cent. The smashing of the market became terrific. Still they waited. Union Pacific declined 10½ points in ten sales. Northern Pacific and other stocks went down in like proportion. Five minutes passed—ten minutes past 2 o'clock. Men looked into each other's ghastly faces. Then, at precisely 2.15, the curtain went up with Morgan and Standard Oil in the center of the stage with money—real money, twenty-five millions of money—giving it away at 10 per cent.

"Oh, uncrowned King!"

"None but himself can be his parallel."

* * * * * * *

"Even to the dullest person standing by,
Who fastened still on him a wondering eye,
He seemed the master spirit of the land."

And so ended the panic.

How beautifully it all worked out. They had the whole country terrorized. They had the money of the deposits of the banks of every State in the Union to the amount of five hundred million, nearly all of which was in the vaults of the big group banks. This served two purposes—it made the country banks join in the cry for currency revision and it supplied the big operators with money to squeeze out investors and speculators at the very bottom of the decline, taking in the stock at an enormous profit. In this connection, the operations of Morgan and the Standard Oil furnish additional evidence of the character of this panic. We have record proof of their utter contempt for commercial interests, not only for the country generally, but for legitimate trade in New York City as well. Had there been bankers with high ideals, bankers with devotion to commercial interests and patriotism for their country, in control of the centralized banks of New York City, the financial mistress of a continent, with a serious panic on, real in character, which had spread throughout the great business houses of the metropolis and to the centers of trade in the nation, bankers having to deal with that crisis, and pressed on the commercial side for money with which to protect the interests and the commercial honor of the country on the one hand, while the bulls and bears of Wall street clamored for loans to enable them to speculate off of the fears and misfortunes of their fellows on the curb and in the stock exchange—confronted, I say, with that dual appeal from the commerce of the country upon the one hand, and the speculators upon the other, bankers who were commercial bankers and not underwriting bankers, promoting bankers, and operating bankers would have cared first of all for the merchant, the manufacturer, and the commerce of the country. How was it with Morgan and the Standard Oil banks? Did they give aid and support to the distressed merchant and manufacturer? Did they say to the bulls and bears, "You shall be denied the funds of our banks to still further stimulate existing excitement?" Alas, no. They pursued the course of the speculating banker. They ministered to the needs of Wall street, quite deaf to the appeals of commerce. Their course was that of men who were playing with the credit of the country for a purpose. They curtailed their commercial loans in every possible way. They steadily increased their call loans on the street, bestowing favor in a way to promote their own interests, supplying their own private brokers, denying applications and forcing all other brokers to a cash basis wherever it would turn the balance their way. The increase of call loans on collateral aggregated over fifty millions. They let great commercial houses, great manufacturing concerns, like the Westinghouse Company, down to ruin and dishonor, while they protected their speculative patrons. No better evidence could be asked to establish the character of this panic or the character of the men who were in command. By their fruits ye shall know them!

Mr. President, I find myself unable to conclude to-night what I have to say on the bill, and I ask permission to stop here and resume in the morning.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Wisconsin has occupied the floor long enough for a man who has only recently been ill. As he desires to retire for the present, I will ask the Senate to resume consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that we may proceed with the appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16882) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not observe when we acted upon the amendment on page 121 relating to Alaska. I promised one of the Senators that I would defer its consideration until he could be present.

Mr. CLAY. What amendment is that, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment on page 121. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] is not present, and he may have observed that the amendment was agreed to. I desire that it shall not be taken up until he can be present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be regarded as open and will be passed over for the present.

For three stenographers, one for the chief justice and one for each associate justice, at $900 each; in all, $34,440, one-half of which shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 171, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "bailiff, one thousand five hundred" and insert "marshal, two thousand;" and in line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "fifty-five thousand eight" and insert "fifty-six thousand three," so as to make the clause read:

Court of Claims: For the chief justice of the Court of Claims, $6,500; four judges, at $6,000 each; chief clerk, $3,500; assistant clerk, $2,500; marshal, $2,000; one clerk, $1,600; two clerks, at $1,400 each; stenographer, $1,200; three clerks, at $1,200 each; one chief messenger, $1,000; three firemen; three watchmen; elevator conductor, $720; two assistant messengers; one laborer, and two charwomen; in all, $56,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 171, line 18, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "six," so as to make the clause read:

To defray the cost of the employment of auditors and additional stenographers, when deemed necessary, in the Court of Claims, and for a stenographer at $1,600 for the chief justice, to be disbursed under the direction of the court, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 171, line 24, after the words "Court of Claims," to strike out "from more rapid deterioration, on account of the leaky condition of the roof," so as to make the clause read:

For repairs deemed necessary to preserve the building occupied by the Court of Claims, under the direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 173, line 3, after the word "Sec. 3," to strike out:

"The appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons incapacitated for performing the service for which such person has been employed," and insert "The appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons incapacitated otherwise than temporarily for performing such service, and the heads of Departments shall cause this provision to be enforced," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. The appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons incapacitated otherwise than temporarily for performing such service, and the heads of Departments shall cause this provision to be enforced.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. BACON. As the committee amendments have been disposed of, I wish to make an inquiry. I gather from the casual glance I have been able to give over the bill as the reading has proceeded that there has been a very general raising of salaries of the higher officials of the Departments. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CULLOM. In part you are. I will make a statement. We found on an examination of the Departments, of Cabinet officers, and other men employed——

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of officers of that rank. We raised their salaries something like a year ago.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not speaking of raising the salaries of Cabinet officers, but I was about to say that the testimony before the committee was that their forces were becoming less and less valuable for the reason that we always give them more force at a cheap rate and give them nobody entirely and thoroughly qualified for duty. Hence we adopted the policy of opening the way to promotions in the Departments so that they might be able to keep men who are qualified to discharge their duties.

Mr. BACON. I am not taking any issue with the committee as to the propriety of that course, and I simply asked that question for the purpose of propounding another. It is whether the committee has taken into consideration the propriety of raising the salaries of those who do not stand quite so high in rank as the officials who have received an increase?

I am speaking of the general clerical force in the different Departments. We began at the top and we have raised salaries very generally. We raised our own salaries some 50 per cent. We have passed a bill raising the pay of Army officers, and we have raised the pay of various officials of the executive departments. We could not raise the pay of the President under the law, but we have practically done so by not only giving him $25,000 to pay contingent expenses, miscellaneous items, which he himself has the control of, but we have also given him $25,000 to defray traveling expenses.

We have raised the pay of Federal judges; we have raised the pay of the clerical force of the two Houses, and now we are raising the pay of the higher clerical officials of the Departments. I should add that we have raised the pay also of common soldiers very materially.

The question in my mind is why we should stop at the pay of the lower classes of the clerical force of the executive department. It seems to me that they are entitled to consideration, as well as all other officers of the Government. I do not mention any of these increases in pay from that of the President down in any spirit of criticism; but, accepting all the increases and allowances as proper, which I concede them to be, in view of the increased cost of living and everything of that kind, the inquiry in my mind is why you should attend to the necessities of every other Department and all the grades of officials in every other Department of the Government, and why the lower clerical force in the various Departments should be omitted from that increase?

Mr. CULLOM. Is the Senator through with his inquiry?

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is the inquiry.

Mr. CULLOM. The fact I already stated, that in part we raised the salaries of higher clerks to give an opportunity to the lower clerks to come up. We thus open a way to promotion which has not been heretofore possible. When we have given a Department additional clerks heretofore we have generally put them in at the foot, at the very lowest price we could get them, and the result has been that nearly the whole force are at a lower rate of salary than they ought to be. The policy adopted by the subcommittee and the full committee has been to open a prospect for the people at a low salary to work up and get a salary that will be worth staying in the Department for.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from Illinois what is the general percentage of increase in the salaries of the employees of the executive department? Does the increase really amount to a substantial increase on the average in the pay of all the employees of the Government to the extent of 20 or 25 per cent?

Mr. CULLOM. It does not, Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think that such an increase is imperatively demanded.

Mr. CULLOM. To be a little more definite in reference to our own action, a Cabinet officer, or some one representing a Cabinet officer, comes before the committee and says, "Here is a position for which more salary must be paid; we can not get along without it; we can not keep the man;" and all that sort of an argument is presented to us. We give in such cases more salary when we become convinced that they ought to have it, but we have not acted upon any theory of giving so much additional per cent to any one.

Mr. WARREN. Will my colleague on the committee allow me to make a statement?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. We have not only provided, as the Senator has so well said, places at the top, which permit No. 3, to become No. 4, No. 2 to become No. 3, No. 1 to become No. 2, a thousand-dollar place to be raised to twelve hundred, a nine-hundred-dollar place to be raised to one thousand, and so forth, but in some cases where there is a large employment of clerks we have made a change. For instance, we have put in fifty more clerks at $1,200, and some less at $1,000, which allows all those below to be promoted.

It is my opinion that we have increased to a greater extent those along the lower lines and many more in number than we have the upper.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Wyoming is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it seems to me that he recognizes the fact that the rule which has been applied to the payment of officers and soldiers of the Army is not the rule which he has just stated as applied to the employees in the civil branch of the Government.

For instance, as I understand the Senator from Wyoming, the rule which has been adopted has not been to give a uniform increase to all the clerical force of the various Departments, but by making a provision for a higher class of clerical force there is opportunity for those who are now in the lower class to be promoted up to the higher class, where they will get an increase of salary. But at the same time, those who remain in the lower class do not have any increase.

When it came to the military branch of the service, and I fully approved of everything that was done in that regard, there was a uniform increase of salary in every grade from the Lieutenant-General down to the lowest private. If the same rule had been applied in that case as the Senator now says was applied in the civil service, of course the opportunity might have been given to privates to be promoted, and they would have the increased pay of a corporal, and in that way privates who are deserving might get an increase in the wages by getting a promotion, or a corporal might be promoted to be a sergeant, and the pay of a sergeant might have been increased, and so he would get the increased pay.

But, on the contrary, that was not the rule adopted. It was recognized that the necessity for increased pay was one which did not simply affect the meritorious class who might secure promotion, but it should be extended to all those in the military service. I am at a loss to see——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me until I finish the sentence; then I will yield with pleasure. If there is a recognition of the fact that conditions make living more costly and that therefore a larger rate of salary is required in order to pay the expenses of the various officials and employees of the Government, I am at a loss to see why we should stop short of giving an increase to all the employees of the Government instead of excluding a part of them.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator's comparison, as I think he will see in a moment, is not good. We have raised none of the civil employees of the Army or of those who are in other military service except as we have raised other clerks——

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator mean by civil employees of the Army?

Mr. WARREN. That is, the employees of the War Department.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of them at all.

Mr. WARREN. We have raised private soldiers, who are getting $15 and $16 a month, but we have not raised clerks in the War Department. If the Senator will reflect a moment, he will see that it is not a good way to make a general raise in this bill. To do that we ought to pass another bill whereby the present law fixing the pay of classes 1, 2, 3, 4, and so forth, would be regularly raised from the pay now provided by law.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking about the civil employees in the War Department.

Mr. WARREN. I am not talking about that or any other Department. I am not talking about the War Department at the present time. I am talking about the executive department as a whole. The War Department we will dismiss for the moment. We are confined by laws which provide that clerks of class 4 shall receive a certain salary, those of class 3 a certain salary, others of class 2 another, and so on down. If you make a raise to a certain percentage of course you might make a different law.

We make a few more clerks of class 4, and in that way the promotion goes all down the line. The increase in the salary of one clerk of class 4 raises, we will say, six people below that grade. Then when you come to raise, as we have done in some cases, fifty or sixty in a lot, it not only raises that fifty or sixty, but it raises the fifty or sixty next below them, and fifty or sixty next below the others, and so on down to the lowest paid clerk, because the places are open, and more clerks are promoted under the civil-service rules and under the system of the Departments as to the record of efficiency.

Mr. BACON. I confess I can not see the logic of the reason at all. If it were true that promotion went along the entire line and reached every clerk, then of course the system by which that was done would be a matter of comparative unimportance, but if I understand it correctly there are a great many who will not be promoted.

Mr. WARREN. They will not all be raised simultaneously at one time, because new clerks are constantly certified in from the civil service to take the lower places, but by this rapid promotion, if they are not promoted now, they will very soon reach higher places.

Mr. BACON. But that is not certain as to all the clerical force. The principle upon which we have proceeded in legislating with reference to salaries has not been based upon the scale of merit in the order of promotion. It has been based upon the recognition, in the case of every official of the Government, from the President of the United States down——

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator is entirely wrong when he says the pay of every official, from the President down, has been raised.

Mr. BACON. I said we could not raise the salary of the President, but we have done other things equivalent to it. Of course we have not violated the law intentionally in that regard. But it has been done as to all the higher officials where it could be done. It has been done in the case of the salaries of the judiciary of all ranks. It has been done in the case of the legislative department.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator will remember, it was done in the case of the judiciary by a separate law. The law was changed.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. A raise was provided for the Cabinet officers, but not for the assistants, the Assistant Attorneys-General and assistant attorneys, and all of that line.

Mr. BACON. But that is being done now, I say.

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. BACON. There are in the bill a number of cases in which that is done, and if it is not done I will make the same criticism upon it that I am making upon the overlooking of the lower clerical force. I think we ought not to make any distinction, as we have recognized that in our own salaries a large increase was required by changed conditions, as we have recognized it in a large number of officials, and after it has been recognized so far as the Senate could recognize it in the Army from the Lieutenant-General down to the lowest private, and properly recognized, as the Senator knows, I approved of it and cooperated very cheerfully in the movement. It is going to be recognized in the Navy.

Now, why it should be recognized so generally and the clerical force of the Departments in Washington should all be omitted, I can not understand from the explanation given by the committee. It seems to me if it be true that the changed conditions made it proper that there should be this increase of salary generally throughout the civil and military departments of the Government as to all ranks in some cases and as to the higher ranks in others, it ought to be made general and the lower orders of clerks—I say lower, I mean lower in rank—should also have the same increase. It costs them the increased amount to live just the same as it has cost us the increased amount to live.

I of course can not offer an amendment. I say I can not offer it. I mean that I do not know in what form to put it. But if the bill is going over, and I presume it will, I hope that there will be a question submitted to the Senate in order that we may determine the matter. Of course if the Senate thinks otherwise, all right; but I do think that having recognized the fact that the increased cost of living made it proper that our own salaries should be raised and that the salaries of the higher officials should be raised, and now that the salaries of higher clerks should be raised, the same changed condition ought to induce us to do a like justice to the lower classes of clerks, who are not here to speak for themselves and have not many people to speak for them, who have to bear their burdens and endure their sufferings in silence.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say to the Senator from Georgia that we are not dealing with that proposition. We are not simply raising the pay of a higher class of clerks.

Mr. BACON. I mean those higher than the lower class of clerks.

Mr. CULLOM. We have raised the pay of clerks who are getting $1,800, some at $1,600, some at $1,400, some at $1,200, some at $1,000, some even down to $720. We have raised the pay of all those classes of clerks more or less.

Mr. BACON. But the criticism I make is that that is done as to some. I say if it is necessary as to any it should be done as to all.

Mr. CULLOM. The main purpose we had in view was to supply the Department with a proper force to do the work.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Illinois will pardon me, we have recognized in a way we can not deny that there has been a changed condition in this country which has made the cost of living very much greater than it formerly was. We have recognized that in our own cases.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that.

Mr. BACON. I say the same condition makes it more difficult for this lower class of clerks to live, and we ought to recognize it equally in their cases.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Georgia has it quite within his power, if he thinks that that ought to be done, to draw an amendment to give them 10 per cent or 20 per cent or 40 per cent increase of their present salary, and then the question can be settled by the Senate as to whether that is the right thing to do or not.

Mr. BACON. The trouble which presents itself to my mind is this: If there had been in the bill no increase of salaries in individual cases or in individual classes, then a 10 per cent increase, or whatever per cent might be deemed proper, might be suggested by way of amendment. But I do not know in what way I can draw the amendment so that it will harmonize with the action of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator that all he need do is to draw his amendment so as to give every clerk and employee whose salary has not been raised in the bill 20 per cent or 50 per cent or whatever he wants to propose; and he can take the sense of the Senate on the question in that way.

Mr. WARREN. I doubt whether an amendment of that kind could be considered. The law fixes these salaries and it would be making an entirely new law in the appropriation bill.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that the Senate has quite as much authority as we had as a committee to do it.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. If it can not be done by the Senate, then certainly it was not in order for the committee to bring it in.

Mr. BACON. I do not want to do anything which would be futile or without result. I make the suggestion, and if there is any such response on the part of the Senate as would indicate that it would meet with approval, I should be more than glad to do it.

Mr. WARREN. May I make a suggestion just there?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The committee have simply raised the pay so far as the high places are concerned, where no regular statutory limit exists, and there have been very few cases except where it has been done by taking them from one number to the other, as from No. 1 to No. 2, No. 2 to No. 3 and so on, which of itself automatically raises the salary, but without changing the law. The few other cases have been where the responsibilities of the particular duty to which they are assigned has increased or has been considered to require a higher class or harder work than has been performed heretofore.

But after we had passed on a few that could be raised in that manner—and they were very few in number—then the disposition was to equalize as far as we could. Now, I submit that if a percentage were to be added, it would be much more just to add it to the bill as it is amended and now before us than in its original form, because if we were undertaking to equalize it, surely the Senator would not expect, in view of the vast number of employees—a great many thousand, in fact—that there would not exigencies arise that would justify a higher salary for some men than for those in other positions. I suppose he will understand, of course, there may be a class of employees who temporarily are paid, perhaps, more than they should receive in comparison with others. Therefore there should be somewhere some mode of equalizing one with another.

Speaking of the higher cost of living, I noticed with some pleasure the other day that Bradstreet's, who make a report regularly, state that living has gone down in the scale something like 12½ per cent, or that it costs 12½ per cent less to live now than it did at the time of our greatest prosperity. I do not vouch for the statement.

Mr. BACON. I suppose, however, the Senator would hardly recognize the propriety of reducing our own salaries 12½ per cent, having increased them 50 per cent on account of the increased cost of living.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think the Senator and I shall quarrel over that. If he desires a reduction, I will follow him.

Mr. BACON. No; I do not wish the Senator to misunderstand me on the subject. I was just asking the Senator's view. I do not know what may be the sentiment of the Senate on the subject, but if I may be permitted to do so and if it is not out of order at this time—I do not know whether it is or not—I will offer an amendment—I have no time to reduce it to writing, but I can state it and it can be read from the stenographer's notes—adding 20 per cent to the present salary of each employee or official in the Executive Departments of the city of Washington whose salary has not been raised by the present bill.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will my colleague allow me to call his attention to the fact——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to his colleague?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I will say that I know, as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as a certainty, that during the last six or seven years we have gradually increased the compensation of the employees of that Department every year. The present appropriation bill as it passed the House carried provisions for salary increases amounting to $1,200,000. I know we have frequently raised the salaries of clerks from $1,000 to $1,100 per year and from $1,100 to $1,200 per year. I believe, in order to reclassify the service, it would be essential to go over the whole list so as to ascertain what salaries have been increased. A sweeping increase of 20 per cent would give most serious trouble.

Observation and experience have taught me since I have been in the Senate that we are constantly besieged at every session of Congress by employees who desire to have their salaries increased. My colleague is seeking the very best interests of the country, as he always does, but I hardly believe that a sweeping increase of 20 per cent, regardless of classification and without looking into what has been done in the past, would be a wise course to be pursued at this time in this legislative bill.

I know that two years ago we added to the post-office appropriation bill $1,000,000 to increase the salaries of employees. We increased the salaries of rural letter carriers from $750 per year to $900 per year. We have also increased the salaries of the letter carriers in our cities and towns, and the post-office appropriation bill for this session provides for an additional increase of $1,200,000. At every session of Congress we have dealt with that subject. We have dealt with specific instances and certain classes.

Senators will find that all these employees are in the classified service, beginning at $720 a year and gradually working to $900, then to $1,000, then to $1,200 a year. This bill, I will say, with my colleague's permission, provides a number of increases, but they are principally for the assistant secretaries of Departments, such as the First Assistant Postmaster-General, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and the assistants to the Secretary of State, and so forth and so on—increasing them from $4,500 to $5,000. I doubted the wisdom of the action of the Senate committee in doing so, but we have done it, and it has been agreed to.

I hope my colleague will not press his amendment this evening. Would it not be better to take it up later, to classify the salaries, and to deal with the question in a general bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to make an inquiry as to whether any bill is under consideration before the Appropriations Committee, or any other committee, looking to such a general increase in the compensation of the civil employees of the Government as was made in the case of Cabinet officers, the judiciary, and Congress itself? I will state in that connection that when the bill increasing the pay of Members of Congress was here under consideration, I then thought that we ought to take up the claims of the civil employees of the Government before considering the question regarding our own salaries. I certainly did not anticipate so long a delay in the consideration of that question. I realize that an appropriation bill is hardly the proper place to enter into general legislation of this kind; I believe such legislation should be considered in a special bill that will be fully discussed and considered by a committee before it comes to the Senate; but I do not understand that any action is being taken of a general nature regarding the civil employees of the Government. It was certainly my understanding when the bill for the increase of the salaries of Members of Congress was under consideration, that that measure would be speedily followed by a measure for general relief.

I wish to say that in the West, notwithstanding the increases which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] says have been made in the pay of postal employees, there is serious difficulty. The increase in wages has been large throughout the entire West, and the cost of living has been increased. It may be temporarily depressed now, but it has been almost impossible, or, at all events, it has been very difficult, for the Post-Office Department to maintain the high standard of efficiency among its employees that hitherto has prevailed. Men have been leaving the service; men have been leaving the post-offices in that region, and it has been almost impossible to secure proper service for the post-offices.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that in my section of the country we have not had any trouble in securing employees to faithfully discharge their duties in carrying on the work of the Post-Office Department. The applicants for positions of that kind have been so numerous that it is much more difficult to secure positions for them than it is to retain them in office.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That may be the case in the Senator's section, but I am sure that in the Western region and in the mountain region the difficulty does exist and men are leaving the service.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me just a moment right there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator from Nevada entirely as to the trouble in the Western post-offices. I will remind him, however, that the salaries of all those employees are carried in the post-office appropriation bill and nowhere appear in this bill. I agree with the Senator that they are getting too little money and that we are having great trouble in the post-offices in the West, especially in the larger offices, in getting men to do the work for the money that is paid.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My inquiry is not so much with reference to civil employees of the Government outside of Washington. My inquiry is with reference to the condition of the employees here. I think that their salaries ought to be increased, and substantially increased, and that we should not delay further consideration of this subject. I want to ask the chairman of this committee or others who may be informed whether there is any bill pending or likely to be considered at this session which will provide for a general increase of that kind?

Mr. CULLOM. There is no bill that I know of, either in the Senate or in committee, taking up the question of increasing the salaries of all employees of the Government in Washington and undertaking to regulate their pay. We have made a few increases in this bill. My view is, and it is the view, I think, of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the committee, that when the new Senate Office Building is completed, which will be by the next session of Congress, there will have to be a readjustment of the salaries of almost everybody about the Senate wing of the Capitol; and that will be good time to take up the whole subject of the Senate employees, to regulate their salaries according to what ought to be done, and to do it outside of the Appropriations Committee.

The Committee on Appropriations has had the pending bill under consideration, and the subcommittee has been at work on it for two or three weeks, trying to adjust the matter so that it would satisfy the Departments who have the responsibility of the work of the Administration and at the same time raise the salaries somewhat where we could properly do so in the interest of the Government.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will not undertake to destroy this bill or the work that has been done, and start out on a new enterprise of increasing and regulating salaries. That ought to be done in a separate measure without interfering with the work of the Committee on Appropriations. In regulating these salaries we have done the best we could with the light before us, the heads of Departments coming before us, stating their needs and necessities, and what they ought to have in order to properly run the Executive Departments of the Government.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator is through——

Mr. CULLOM. I am through.

Mr. BACON. There has been no disposition to destroy the bill, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, or to interfere with it in any manner, shape, or form. The amendment which I have offered does not affect the amendments which have been put upon the bill by the committee or such increases in salary as have come over from the other House. It simply proposes that where this bill does not increase the salary of any of the civil employees in the various Departments there shall be added to their present salaries the amount of 20 per cent.

Now, in response to the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. CLAY], that already salaries have been raised in a number of instances, I will say that that but increases and accentuates the point which I am making, and that is——

Mr. CLAY. I will say to my colleague——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment—and that is, that we have already made these increases in salaries in so great degree in so many branches of the Government that it is an invidious distinction and an unjust distinction to leave out those who have not been included in the increases which have been made.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to my colleague that the salaries of all post-office employees during the last three or four years have been increased a certain per cent. They start out with a certain salary and receive increases as they become more efficient.

Mr. BACON. They are increased in the way that has been suggested, where a clerk of one class can be promoted to another class.

Mr. CLAY. I would say, then——

Mr. BACON. There has been no such increase of salaries generally as will reach all the civil employees of the Government.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, under the Post-Office Department, originally where a maximum salary was fixed at $1,200, the committee came along and fixed the maximum at $1,300. Consequently, an employee who was drawing a salary of $1,200 could be advanced to $1,300, and one drawing a salary of $1,300 could be advanced to $1,400.

Mr. BACON. "Could be," of course, but not necessarily would be.

Mr. CLAY. They have been.

Mr. BACON. Not all of them by any means, but only a very small proportion of them.

Mr. CLAY. I beg pardon of the Senator. Ninety per cent of the salaries have been increased.

Mr. BACON. Then the other 10 per cent ought to be increased.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I think it is very clear that we shall not get this bill through to-night, and I understand it is very important to some Senators that we have a short executive session. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 18, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 17, 1908.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

I nominate the following-named ensigns to be lieutenants (junior grade) in the Navy from the 3d day of February, 1908, upon the completion of three years' service in present grade:

Ralston S. Holmes,
Fred H. Poteet,
Milton S. Davis,
Charles E. Brillhart,
James D. Willson,
John Rodgers,
Charles Belknap, jr., and
Daniel T. Ghent.

GENERAL PENSION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the conferees on the general pension bill—Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, and Mr. WEISSE.

THREE TREE POINT MILITARY RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill 626.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 626) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and granting the same and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through the Three Tree Point Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Grays Harbor and Columbia River Railway Company, its successors and assigns.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War may authorize the Grays Harbor and Columbia River Railway Company to build a railroad and telegraph line through the Three Tree Point Military Reservation on Columbia River, and to that end may set aside for occupancy by said Grays Harbor and Columbia River Railway Company such ground, and no more, as is actually required for the necessary track, embankments, or trestles: Provided, That the ground so occupied shall remain the property of the United States under such police and other military control as the military authorities may deem it necessary to exercise: Provided further, That the said railway company shall compensate the United States for all timber that may be cut and shall pay such reasonable annual rental for such right of way as may be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the location and grade of said railroad and other details of construction within the limits of the reservation, also all matters pertaining to the operation and maintenance of said railroad, shall be under such regulations as the Secretary of War may deem it advisable to establish in the interest of the military service and as a safeguard against fire to Government timber lands: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the use of any portion of the reservation as a borrow pit for fills and embankments, unless specially authorized so to do by the Secretary of War and upon the payment of such compensation as may be fixed by him.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the road be not commenced within two years from date of approval hereof.

SEC. 3. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, what committee does this bill come from?

Mr. CUSHMAN. From the Military Committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the House Military Committee ever considered it?

Mr. CUSHMAN. It has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much land does this take?

Mr. CUSHMAN. It sets aside for right-of-way purposes the usual width of a railroad right of way through the entire reservation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How large is the reservation?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The reservation is located about 22 miles above the mouth of the Columbia River, and upon the banks of the river. There are about 2 square miles in the reservation. I think the reservation is about a mile and a half in length and about three-quarters of a mile in width.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I notice that you make provision to pay for the timber you cut off.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And pay a rental?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who fixes the rental?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The Secretary of War.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I guess he ought to know something about it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is this bill in the form in which it was prepared by the War Department itself?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Exactly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this bill unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. CAPRON. It is.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The bill itself is exactly as the War Department prepared it, and safeguards the interests of the Government in the reservation. In fact, it goes further than usual by requiring a rental to be paid for the land. We have granted in Oklahoma and other places rights of way for railroads without requiring any rent, reserving the right to have the tracks removed, as this does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But where you grant the right of way you sell the land?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They only get the right of way.

Mr. MANN. Has this military reservation ever been used for any purpose?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Not at all. It was reserved a great many years ago for a military reservation, and is still so reserved, but it has never been fortified.

Mr. MANN. What was the military reservation there for?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Simply because it was situated on the banks of the Columbia River. The Columbia River is a navigable stream, and the War Department a number of years ago established several military reservations, one at the mouth of the river, which is now fortified, another one 22 miles up the river, which has never been fortified and never been used as a reservation for military purposes, but is still reserved so it can be used for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Under authority of law the President has set aside certain public lands for military reservations because it might be needed.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes; because it might be needed in the future.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has any part of this road been built?

Mr. CUSHMAN. No; because they must first procure the right of way before they can build their road; but this bill specifically provides that this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the road be not commenced within two years from the date of approval hereof.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will state to the gentleman from Missouri that in these large military reservations unless Congress does grant the right of way it virtually blocks the people from beginning construction at all. They would have to go around some 20 or 30 miles.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The railroad is to run along the north bank of the Columbia River in the State of Washington.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where does it start?

Mr. CUSHMAN. This road as surveyed is to start from the main line of the Northern Pacific Line and run from that point down the Columbia River to the ocean.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have every reason to believe they are going to build the road?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I have, certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is not a speculative concern?

Mr. CUSHMAN. No, indeed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIGHT-HOUSE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate joint resolution 69, granting authority for the use of certain balances of appropriations for the Light-House Establishment, to be available for certain named purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of it and that it be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which he sends to the desk, and that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it may be considered in the House. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the balances of the appropriations for the construction of vessels for the Light-House Establishment appropriated for in the acts of Congress approved April 28, 1904 (33 Stats., 468); March 3, 1905 (33 Stats., 1171); June 30, 1906 (34 Stats., 659, 660, 710, and 711), and March 4, 1907 (34 Stats., 1317, 1318, and 1319), are hereby made available for the pay of officers and crews, the payment of consular fees, port dues, and exchange, the purchase of provisions, rations, fuel, engineer stores and supplies, pilotage, water, laundry, and all other necessary incidental expenses in the transfer of the following-named vessels of the Light-House Establishment from Tompkinsville, N. Y., where they are to be delivered when completed, to their respective stations: Tenders for the twelfth light-house district, for the thirteenth light-house district, for the Pacific Ocean, for Lake Superior; relief light-vessel for the Pacific coast; Columbia River light-vessel, Oregon; Swiftsure Bank light-vessel, Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, when there is an appropriation made for any particular purpose, for a year, the surplus of the appropriation that is not used goes back into the general fund of the Treasury, does it not, by automatic action?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; under the covering-in act.

Mr. KEIFER. Not in this case.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Missouri is speaking of the annual appropriations. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Missouri and the other Members of the House that these are balances left over from appropriations that were made for the construction of vessels, and in submitting the estimates for appropriation for these vessels originally, they included $15,000 in addition, either because of the increased cost of constructing them on the Pacific coast, if they were constructed there, or to defray the expense of transferring them around to the Pacific coast if constructed on the Atlantic coast.

On the 28th of February last the Comptroller of the Treasury held that these balances were not available for the purpose of sending the vessels around to the Pacific coast. They were all constructed on the Atlantic coast. Now, the $15,000 included in the original appropriation, being a balance, is not available under his decision, for this purpose. It is necessary, therefore, to enact a law making these balances available for this purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the statute made that authorization originally, what sense is there in his ruling?

Mr. TAWNEY. The authorization did not specifically provide that this $15,000 should be used for that purpose, and I will say that heretofore the appropriations have been made in the same way, and the balances have been used for the transfer of the vessels to the Pacific coast, and that would have been done in this case but for the decision of the Comptroller.

Mr. MANN. This is for the transfer of the light-ships?

Mr. TAWNEY. For the light-ships.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CANNON FOR WINCHESTER, VA.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 18689) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze cannon and cannon balls to the city of Winchester, Va.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to the city of Winchester, Va., two brass or bronze condemned field pieces or cannon, with a suitable outfit of cannon balls, which may not be needed in the service, the same to be used at the old headquarters of Gen. George Washington, which are now owned by said city, and to be subject at all times to the order of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States in the delivery of the same.

With the following amendment:

After the word "cannon," in line 5, add the words "with their carriages and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MONONGAHELA CITY BRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13448) to authorize the counties of Allegheny and Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, to change the site of the joint county bridge which now crosses the Monongahela River at Monongahela City, Pa., and to construct a new bridge across said river in the place of said present bridge upon a new site.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Allegheny and Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a joint county bridge and approaches thereto across the Monongahela River at Monongahela City, in the State aforesaid, upon a site located at a distance of about 1,000 feet down the stream of said river from the existing bridge across the same, which connects Monongahela City, in Washington County, with Forward Township, in Allegheny County, and is now maintained by the said two counties jointly for the uses and purposes of general public travel. The said bridge hereby authorized shall be constructed in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and upon its construction shall take the place of and be substituted for the aforesaid existing bridge, which shall thereupon be torn down and removed.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following amendment:

At the end of section 1 add the following:

"Provided, That the new bridge hereby authorized shall be completed within eighteen months from date of approval of this act, and the existing bridge shall be completely removed within six months thereafter: Provided further, That this act shall not be construed as nullifying the orders of the Secretary of War, issued under date of October 10, 1906, to the commissioners of the counties of Allegheny and Washington, Pa., and the Williamsport Bridge Company, requiring the alteration of the existing bridge, but the said orders shall remain in full force and effect, and unless the new bridge is built and the present bridge is removed within the time specified in this act the aforesaid parties shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in section 18 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, for failure to comply with the lawful orders of the Secretary of War."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WANGER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had insisted upon its amendments, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. OWEN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3530. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at Oklahoma City, Okla.;

S. 1036. An act for the relief of patentees and locators of military bounty land warrants, agricultural college land scrip, and surveyor-general's certificates;

S. 1072. An act to authorize the extension and enlargement of the post-office building at Fremont, Nebr.; and

S. R. 68. Joint resolution providing for additional lands for Idaho under the provisions of the Carey Act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendment, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 15841. An act to amend section 4896 of the Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the following title:

H. R. 16143. An act to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1036. An act for the relief of patentees and locators of military bounty land warrants, agricultural college land scrip, and surveyor-generals' certificates—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 1072. An act to authorize the extension and enlargement of the post-office building at Fremont, Nebr.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 3530. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at Oklahoma City, Okla.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. R. 68. Joint resolution providing for additional lands for Idaho under the provisions of the Carey Act—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16143. An act to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands.

ALIENATION OF LANDS OF ALLOTTEES OF THE QUAPAW AGENCY, OKLA.

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 16743, for the removal of the restrictions on alienation of lands of allottees of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., and the sale of all tribal lands, school, agency, or other buildings on any of the reservations within the jurisdiction of such agency, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after sixty days from the passage of this act all restrictions as to sale, incumbrance, or taxation on lands allotted to members of the various tribes of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., are hereby removed, except as to 40 acres of each allotment in the Quapaw, Peoria, Miami, Ottawa, Eastern Shawnee, Wyandot, and Seneca reservations and except as to 24 acres in the Modoc Reservation: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, and he is hereby authorized, whenever he shall be satisfied that any allottee of said agency is competent and capable of managing his or her affairs at any time, to cause to be issued to such allottee a patent in fee simple for such portion of his or her allotment hereby reserved for sale, incumbrance, or taxation, and thereafter all restrictions as to sale, incumbrance, or taxation of said land covered by such fee-simple patent shall be removed: Provided further, That any sale, incumbrance, or contract for sale or incumbrance made or entered into by or on behalf of any allottee prior to the expiration of sixty days from the passage of this act or prior to the issuance of such fee-simple patent shall be absolutely null and void.

SEC. 2. That within sixty days after the passage of this act each allottee of the Quapaw Agency, the father, and in case of no father then the mother, and in case of no father or mother then the legal guardian, acting for the minor child, shall select the portion of each allotment hereby reserved from sale, incumbrance, or taxation and file with the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the officer in charge of said agency a description thereof: Provided, That if no such selection shall be made as above provided, then the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such selection for and in behalf of any allottee, and such selection when so made shall be conclusive evidence that such land is reserved from alienation, incumbrance, or taxation.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell all the tribal lands within the jurisdiction of the Quapaw Agency, and all agency, school, or other Government buildings on any reservation within the jurisdiction of said agency, at public auction or by sealed bids, under such regulations as he may prescribe; and he is hereby authorized to convey all lands so sold to the purchaser thereof by patents in fee. And all lands within such agency which have heretofore been reserved for agency, school, or other purposes shall, on approval of this act, revert to the tribe within whose reservation the lands are located and be sold as tribal lands as herein provided.

SEC. 4. That after the sale of all such lands as provided herein, the net proceeds of such sale, together with all funds belonging to such tribes from whatever source derived, shall be apportioned and paid pro rata, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to the members of each of the respective tribes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HACKNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRESENTATION OF STATUE OF WASHINGTON TO SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 134, authorizing the presentation of the statue of President Washington now located in the Capitol grounds to the Smithsonian Institution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the statue of President Washington, now located in the Capitol grounds east of the Capitol, be, and the same is hereby, presented to the Smithsonian Institution.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out in lines 5, 6, and 7 the words "to aid that institution in its efforts to establish a National Gallery of Art in the city of Washington."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois some questions. Is it in contemplation to establish a museum of art down there the general nature of which is to be the same as the statue in front of the Capitol?

Mr. MANN. The amendment to the bill strikes out that portion of the bill. The Greenough statue, if the joint resolution passes, will probably be put in the new National Museum, not so much as an object of art, as an object of historic value. The history of the statue is rather interesting.

It is the result of a resolution passed by Congress in 1832. On February 16 of that year the House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ Horatio Greenough, of Massachusetts, to execute in marble a full-length pedestrian statue of Washington, to be placed in the center of the Rotunda of the Capitol; the head to be a copy of Houdon's Washington (in the capitol at Richmond) and the accessories to be left to the judgment of the artist.

On the consideration of this resolution, it was said by Mr. Jarvis, in charge of the resolution, that at the close of the Revolutionary war the Congress (ten States being present by their Representatives) had unanimously voted a statue of General Washington as a testimony of their esteem for his virtues and the services he had rendered to his country. In 1799 a resolution had passed unanimously for a monument instead of a statue. In 1800 the monument had been exchanged for a mausoleum:

This last resolution had in fact proved as fruitful as those which had preceded it. Several of the States had in the meanwhile showed their sense of Washington's virtues and services by erecting statues to his memory. The United States had done nothing but pass resolutions. When we looked around for the statue, the monument, the mausoleum they had ordered it was not to be seen. Those things existed nowhere but in the Journals of Congress. It was time that something more effectual should be done.

At the time this resolution was passed and the statue ordered it was the intention of Congress to place it over the vaulted tomb of Washington, which was to be constructed in the crypt of the Capitol, with an opening through the floor of the Rotunda. Washington's remains were then entombed at Mount Vernon under the control of private ownership. The death of the proprietor of the Mount Vernon estate had just taken place and it could not be known whether the tomb of Washington would eventually fall into the hands of a friend or stranger, and it was the hope of Congress that his remains might be removed to the Capitol building and entombed there.

While the original plan could not be carried through, because the owners of the Mount Vernon estate declined to permit the removal of Washington's remains, yet provision was made by Congress in 1840 for "a suitable foundation for supporting the colossal statue of Washington in the center of the Rotunda of the Capitol," and such foundations were actually laid and the statue was placed in the Rotunda.

But in 1843 Congress made an appropriation to remove the statue to the east side of the Capitol grounds, with a view of placing it "on a pedestal, under shelter, and in proper position."

When the Capitol grounds were improved under the direction of Frederick Law Olmsted in 1875 the statue of Washington was placed in the position it now occupies.

At the time that Greenough was selected by Congress as the artist it was stated, on the consideration of the resolution, that he was considered as about to become the successor of Canova and of Chantry, and likely to become the greatest sculptor of his time. It was said that Mr. Greenough had no rival among his countrymen; that he stood alone and that there was, therefore, nothing invidious in the introduction of his name into the resolution. It was said by Mr. Dearborn in the House, on the consideration of the resolution, that he felt confident "when the work should have been completed the whole world would consider it not only as honorable to the country, but as conferring immortality upon the artist."

While the Smithsonian Institution has not formally agreed to take the statue, it is probable that that institution will be quite willing to accept the statue, to be placed in connection with the new National Museum.

The following indicates the opinion of Doctor Walcott, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution:

DEAR MR. MANN: In response to your request I have recently made a thorough examination of the Greenough statue of Washington, which is located on the plaza east of the Capitol. The statue is being injured by weathering, owing to the softness of the marble, and it should be protected both as an object of historical interest and of art.

If the statue is transferred to the custody of the Smithsonian Institution, I will endeavor, with the approval of the Regents of the institution, to provide a suitable place for it.

As the present granite base is inappropriate, provision should be made for a marble base in keeping with the statue, and also for the cost of moving and properly resetting the statue.

Very truly, yours,

CHAS. D. WALCOTT, Secretary.

HON. JAMES R. MANN,
United States House of Representatives,
Regent of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C.

The statue was located in the Rotunda, I think, in 1841. Two or three years after it was moved outside. It used to be covered every winter, but this winter it has not been covered. It is rapidly deteriorating where it is. Its principal worth is to maintain it as an object of historic interest. I hope we will be able to place it in the National Museum.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the bill has my hearty indorsement as it was reported by the Committee on the Library. The gentleman from Illinois is a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution, and I want to ask the gentleman if he will take an interest in some other works of art in the vicinity of the Capitol and be willing to have them presented to the Smithsonian Institution?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, while there are a large number of objects, so-called works of art, in and around the Capitol which ought to be embalmed in some place outside of the Capitol, I doubt whether the Smithsonian Institution would be willing to take all of them, even as historic objects. We might establish a collection of art freaks and fill it full from not a great distance from the Capitol, but this statue is on a different basis.

Mr. McCALL. I want to say on that point that this is regarded by artists as a superior work of art. It is the work of Greenough, who was a celebrated sculptor in his day. I understand the work is deteriorating, exposed to the action of the weather—the rain, the wind, the frost, and the sunshine—and that it is very desirable to have it protected in some way.

With reference to the figure, I will say that an old artist who is skilled in interpreting the meaning of works of art was asked what Washington was doing, what he meant by extending his hand, and the artist replied that he was reaching for his clothes, which were down in the Smithsonian Institution. [Laughter.] So it would seem proper that the statue itself should go there.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think the House will pass the resolution now. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCALL. I was hoping, Mr. Speaker, that we might get the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in order to pass his resolution through the House, to consent to take, for instance, the statue of the distinguished Missourian, Tom Benton, which I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is ashamed to look at as he goes through the chamber of horrors called "Statuary Hall," and then I hope also that the gentleman may take an interest in another statue which has recently been added to the collection. Since Curry was presented I think the collection can boast the most magnificent frock coat that America has yet produced. We have a number of others which I trust the gentleman will have his eye on.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman that while the Smithsonian Institution and the National Museum are the resting place and the storehouse for various sorts of articles gathered from all parts of the world, representing almost every variety of human ingenuity, yet the line will be drawn on a large amount of art that is accepted at the Capitol, and they will refuse to take it, in my judgment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LEASING ALLOTTED OR UNALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS FOR MINING PURPOSES.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17301) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease allotted or unallotted Indian lands for mining purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any mineral lands in any Indian reservation created by act of Congress, treaty, or Executive order which contain valuable minerals, petroleum, or other mineral products, or coal or saline beds, or lands containing clays, building or other stone of commercial value shall be subject to lease by the Secretary of the Interior on such terms and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and any such lands allotted to an Indian under any law or treaty, with restrictions on alienation, may be leased by the allottee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, on such terms and under such regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not appy to the Five Civilized Tribes.

With the following amendment:

Page 1, line 8, insert "for a term not to exceed twenty-five years."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman ought to make some explanation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman for his information that this bill comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs with the unanimous report.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 1225, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

LEASE OF ALLOTTED OR UNALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS FOR MINING PURPOSES.

March 12, 1908.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 17301):

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17301) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease allotted or unallotted Indian lands for mining purposes, having examined the same, report favorably with the following amendment, viz:

After the word "lease," in line 7, page 1, insert the words "for a term not to exceed twenty-five years."

The bill as thus amended will read as follows, viz:

"Be it enacted, etc., That any mineral lands in any Indian reservation created by act of Congress, treaty, or Executive order which contain valuable minerals, petroleum, or other mineral products, or coal or saline lands, or lands containing clays, building or other stone of commercial value shall be subject to lease for a term not to exceed twenty-five years by the Secretary of the Interior, on such terms and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and any such lands allotted to an Indian under any law or treaty, with restrictions or alienation, may be leased by the allottee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, on such terms and under such regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes."

This bill, except the amendment, was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior by letter dated February 6, 1908, which letter is as follows, viz:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 6, 1908.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, inclosing a copy of H. R. 121, entitled "A bill to subject the mineral lands on the Indian reservations in the United States and Territories to location, operation, development, and entry, and for other purposes," with request for a report embodying my opinion as to the advisability of the legislation proposed.

The title is significant of the purposes of the bill, which, if enacted into law, would authorize mineral locations on Indian reservations in the same manner as other mineral lands of the United States are subject to location, development, operation, and entry.

No provision is made in the bill for payment to the Indians for the lands which would be taken from them should the bill become a law. I believe this would be unjust to the Indians. Realizing, however, that the mineral resources of allotted and unallotted Indian lands should not remain idle and undeveloped, I had caused to be prepared a draft of a bill for submission to Congress, a copy of which is inclosed, which not only permits the leasing of Indian mineral lands in a reservation, but provides that any land allotted to an Indian under any law or treaty may be leased under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

H. R. 121 is objectionable in that if enacted into law it will authorize mineral locations to be made on any Indian reservation without restrictions.

Experience has shown that this is unjust to the Indians, as the inrush of prospective miners is always prejudicial to the Indians' interests, and, in justice to them, the Department should not recommend favorable action on any bill that would render them insecure in their homes. I therefore respectfully recommend that the inclosed draft of a bill be substituted for H. R. 121.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. J. S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

"A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease allotted or unallotted Indian lands for mining purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That any mineral lands in any Indian reservation created by act of Congress, treaty, or Executive order which contain valuable minerals, petroleum, or other mineral products, or coal and saline lands, or lands containing clays, building or other stone of commercial value, shall be subject to lease by the Secretary of the Interior on such terms and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and any such lands allotted to an Indian under any law or treaty, with restrictions on alienation, may be leased by the allottee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, on such terms and under such regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes."

Your committee further reports that the bill H. R. 121 (referred to by the Secretary in the above letter) was introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. STEPHENS of Texas on December 2, 1907. Said bill is as follows, viz:

"A bill to subject the mineral lands on the Indian reservations in the United States and Territories to location, operation, development, and entry, and for other purposes.

"Whereas in the Indian reservations in the United States and Territories there are situated copper, gold, and other mineral veins; and

"Whereas the said Indians occupying and assigned to said reservations have no disposition to operate any of the said mineral lands, and interpose no objection to their operation: Therefore "Be it enacted, etc., That all of the mineral lands in the mountainous parts, aside from the agricultural sections, situated within the boundaries of the Indian reservations in the United States and Territories be, and the same are hereby, declared to be open for location, development, operation, and entry by the citizens of the United States, in the same manner and upon the same terms as other mineral lands of the United States are now subject to location, development, operation, and entry; and that all of said mineral lands in said reservations shall be subject to location, development, operation, and entry, and governed by the same laws, rules, and regulations the same as other mineral lands of the United States are now so subject to location, development, operation, and entry.

"SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

Your committee is of the opinion that it is very necessary that this bill should become a law, for the reason that there is now no law authorizing the sale or lease or development of the minerals on Indian lands, and such a condition is very undesirable. The Indians will not develop their mining lands, and the white man can not do so for the reason that there is now no law authorizing the development and working of mines on Indian lands; hence the necessity for the enactment of this legislation is very manifest and desirable.

It is a bill that has been substituted by the Interior Department—or rather, a draft was substituted for bill 121, and this entire bill was drafted in the Department, with the exception of the amendment. That amendment provides that leases shall not run longer than twenty-five years. I will further state that within the last ten years we have adopted the policy to allot tribal lands to the individual Indians all over the United States. These Indians are still regarded as the wards of the nation, and they can not lease their lands for any purpose, save agricultural purposes, for a period of not to exceed five years.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the bill contemplate the leasing of the surface or the lands?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The mines only, or rather for mining purposes only.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I had the impression that the phraseology of the bill was broad enough to cover the leasing of the surface as well as the mines.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman there is a separate statute for that, permitting the surface to be leased for agricultural purposes for a period not to exceed five years. That is the general law for the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN. This bill would cover both.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It occurs to me that the phraseology of the bill under consideration is such as to cover both leases for agricultural and mining purposes. I doubted if the gentleman desired to have twenty-five-year leases made for agricultural purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think, if the gentleman will permit me to read that section, he will see that he is in error:

That any mineral lands in any Indian reservation created by act of Congress, treaty, or Executive order which contain valuable minerals, petroleum, or other mineral products, or coal or saline lands, or lands containing clays, building or other stone of commercial value, shall be subject to lease, etc.

The language itself indicates nothing but mineral lands, and the minerals therein can be leased.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suppose the description "mineral lands" covers the lands themselves, and would include probably the surface as well as the mineral deposits in the general description.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Texas will yield, might it not be absolutely necessary that the authority to lease the surface of the lands be given? Otherwise it would not be possible to make use of the mineral below—without some use of the surface lands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course the authority to lease the mineral deposits would carry with it authority to lease such rights of ingress and egress on the surface as may be necessary for a proper use of the mineral deposits or a proper development of the mines, but I understand there is a good deal of friction down in the State of Oklahoma at this time in relation to mineral lands. Squatters have located on considerable tracts of land on the surface and are refusing to pay rent or vacate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that in the State of Oklahoma the Five Civilized Tribes country is exempted from the condition of this act.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman is familiar with the difficulties they are having down there now in undertaking to enforce the collection of rents from squatters upon mineral lands, the deposits on which may have been leased heretofore. Are those lands entirely owned by what are called the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; they are owned by the Indians, but this bill does not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes at all in that part of Oklahoma. It only refers to the Indians outside of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma. It does not apply to those tribes at all. There are special laws that govern the leasing of these Oklahoma lands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it the purpose of this bill to authorize only the leasing of the mineral deposits—of oil, coal, stone, and so forth?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the exact purpose of the bill. And the leases are to be made by the Secretary, under the rules and regulations that may be prescribed by him.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is not contemplated now that under the provisions of this bill the surface of the land for agricultural or grazing purposes shall be leased by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is not, and it could not be done, because the Secretary would not permit it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman states that this bill does not apply to the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It does not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no such exception in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is, in the very last sentence, which reads as follows, viz:

Provided, That the provisions of this bill shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. SULZER. Just a question: Has this bill the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was drawn by the Secretary of the Interior (with the exception of the amendment limiting it to twenty-five years) in lieu of H. R. 121, introduced by me and copied in the report. I prefer my bill, but find it is impossible to pass it, and I am forced to accept this bill as the best I can get.

Mr. SULZER. And is it also satisfactory to the Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. Then it is satisfactory to me.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. If the surface is occupied for the purposes of agriculture, and entry should be made for the purpose of development of mineral resources, is there any regulation as to adjustment in regard to the land occupied for the purposes of agriculture?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Secretary of the Interior has control of agricultural lands belonging to Indian tribes or individual Indians under such regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The lands are divided into agricultural and timber lands, so that mineral lands would not be considered agricultural lands at all?

Mr. REEDER. Did I understand the gentleman that under the general law as to the leasing of agricultural lands they may be leased for five years?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In the Indian Territory the Five Civilized Tribes have the right to lease for five years. Outside of that they have not. And other Indian lands are leased for agricultural purposes under rules and regulations made by the Secretary.

Mr. REEDER. My understanding of the laws of the Five Civilized Tribes was that they may only lease their lands for one year.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. By legislation they have changed that very recently, I understand.

Mr. REEDER. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. To what part of Oklahoma does this bill apply?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It does not affect the Five Civilized Tribes at all. It is the other Indians of the United States. It has no application to the Five Civilized Tribes, but would apply to any Indians outside of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. FULTON. Does it affect all the Indians of the United States outside of the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. It does not affect particularly the Indians in Oklahoma, then?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; it makes an exception of the Five Civilized Tribes, but does apply to all other Indians in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GOVERNMENT FOR HAWAII.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

A bill (H. R. 10540) to amend section 73 of the act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

Be it enacted, etc., That the portion of section 73 of "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, which reads as follows: "And no lease of agricultural land shall be granted, sold, or renewed by the government of the Territory of Hawaii for a longer period than five years until Congress shall otherwise direct," is hereby amended to read as follows: "And no lease of agricultural land shall be granted, sold, or renewed by the government of the Territory of Hawaii for a longer period than twenty years, and in every such case the land, or any part thereof so leased, may at any time during the term of the lease be withdrawn from the operation thereof for homestead or public purposes, in which case the rent reserved shall be reduced in proportion to the value of the part so withdrawn, and every such lease shall contain a provision to that effect."

Also, the following amendment was read:

On page 1, line 12, strike out the word "twenty" and insert the word "fifteen."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I wish to ask the gentleman if the purpose of this bill is to permit the renewal of the leases held by the sugar men for a period of fifteen years?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The purpose of the bill is to increase the small holdings and to open up the lands to settlement by small holders. As the gentleman knows, now the lands are pretty generally held by large sugar-growing corporations and pineapple plantations. Under the provisions of the organic act leases of agricultural lands were not permitted to be granted, sold, or renewed for more than five years. Now, the gentleman knows from observation of that country that it is quite impossible for a man of limited means to go upon the wild lands or jungle lands and improve them within five years. It is necessary to remove large rocks and jungles, and perhaps make arrangements for irrigation; and it would take five years, and perhaps more, to prepare the land to grow a crop; and in the case of some crops, like rubber, as the gentleman knows, it would be impossible to get crops to produce in less than four or five years. So that the result has been that these lands have been pretty generally taken up and occupied by corporations, and men of small means have not been permitted by reason of these restrictions to enter upon these lands. The purpose of this bill is to broaden this provision and to increase the number of small holdings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any limitation on the number of acres that can be leased by any individual or corporation fixed in the organic act?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; there is, however, under the general law a provision, and perhaps the gentleman may recall it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. For instance, a homestead lease of 8 acres, as provided under section 286 of the homestead laws. The lease shall not cover more than 8 acres of first-class agricultural land, 16 acres of second-class agricultural land, 1 acre of wet land, 30 acres of first-class pastoral land, 60 acres of second-class pastoral land, and 45 acres of pastoral and agricultural land. Now, the gentleman knows the method of survey there. They do not use the rectangular system of survey that we use here. It does not obtain there. The wet lands, the gentleman knows, are used for taro and rice. That term "wet lands" has a legal significance there. The lands above that are used for sugar growing and pineapples, and these are called "first-class agricultural lands and second-class agricultural lands, and so on up," and the gentleman understands about the lands further up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that there were very extensive holdings leased before our occupation. These leases are now beginning to fall in. Will it be possible under this bill for these large corporations to obtain a renewal of their leases for fifteen years?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understand not. It is understood to be the purpose and design of the bill to prevent that.

Mr. MANN. I call the attention of the gentleman to this provision of the bill, which I think does away with the objection he has:

And in every such case the land, or any part thereof so leased, may at any time during the term of the lease be withdrawn from the operation thereof for homestead or public purposes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What I desire to know is what there is in the bill that prevents or restricts the releasing of these large holdings that are said to be held by corporations for a term of fifteen years?

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the bill. The bill provides that even if the lease is made for a term of fifteen years they can take it away from the lessee at any time without remuneration for homestead and other public purposes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not believe much in the policy of the Government keeping the title to land and leasing it, as is done under the present system.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But under the present system the gentleman will perceive it is quite impossible to develop these lands. Vast areas there are simply jungle and rock.

Mr. MANN. I take it these lands are not of much value without some form of irrigation.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Absolutely of no value; and not only that, but there are great rocks there, and it requires the expenditure of large sums of money to get them and the jungle off the land.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are there considerable portions of the sugar lands leased to tenants?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes, sir; I so understand.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. These are in a high state of development?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They are highly developed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Do I understand that under this law those tenants may secure an additional lease for fifteen years?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I suppose the tenant might go on and agree to lease a certain amount of the land, but he would earn the rent. It would take him five years to get that land in condition to grow crops.

Mr. FINLEY. How many acres of land can he lease to any one person under the provisions of this bill and the general laws governing the subject?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is what I was trying to call attention to. They have a peculiar system out there.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that, but under this bill——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. This was an amendment to the organic act, which the gentleman may remember went on in the House. I have forgotten who introduced the amendment; possibly the gentleman himself did. Now, there is a general law in regard to homestead leases in Hawaii, and then again there is what is called a "freehold"——

Mr. FINLEY. I am familiar with that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. This does not change that at all, as I understand.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman hold that under this bill only a homestead can be leased to any one person?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not think there is any limitation as to the amount of land that can be taken up.

Mr. FINLEY. That is the point. Now, is it not possible under that bill that one person might lease 5,000 acres, in the event that there is that much land there?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not think there is any limitation as to the area of the holdings, but if a person should proceed to lease that amount of land and improve it, subject to the right of the Government to proceed to take that and cut it up into homestead holdings, it would certainly be of great benefit. The law as to the number of acres is not changed in any respect.

Mr. FINLEY. I am familiar with the general law. The gentleman and myself helped to frame the organic law. Now, suppose a thousand acres or more of land was leased to one person and improved. When the time came and somebody wished to take that land or a part of it for homestead purposes, would he not have to compensate the holder of that lease for whatever improvements had been put on the land?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There is a provision in the bill to that effect.

Mr. FINLEY. I know there is, but I wish to bring it out.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Now he would have to compensate. Then, would it not be better to permit homesteaders to take up the land in the first instance?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I did not catch that.

Mr. FINLEY. Would it not be better to permit homesteaders to take up these public lands in the first instance? Is it not true that holdings of real estate by individuals in Hawaii are very limited in acreage, and is not that one of the troubles there?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Not very limited, because the acreage is considerable. As to second-class land, they may have 16 acres.

Mr. FINLEY. I am speaking of the actual holdings.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. My recollection is that the average holdings of land by the people of Hawaii are very, very small.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken. Balancing the small holdings against the large holdings, the average holding would be large. The difficulty in Hawaii is that the lands themselves in their natural state are very difficult to subdue to agricultural purposes. They are covered with immense rocks, the land is arid, and nearly all of it must be irrigated before it can be made productive, except that part of the island of Hawaii on the eastern side, where they have rains, and there they are raising sugar.

Mr. FINLEY. I have some knowledge of that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It takes large capital; the rocks have to be removed and the jungle has to be taken off in order to get the land ready for the crops. They have to put on a steam plow to break the land up, and then water must be conducted from a long distance to the land, and the land must have irrigation, so that it is obvious that the land can not be held in large holdings by men of small means.

Mr. FINLEY. Is it not true that there is a very small area of wild land, of uncultivated wild land, in Hawaii?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There is an immense area of uncultivated, wild land there.

Mr. FINLEY. First-class land and second-class land?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think there is of first and second class pastoral land, but not of first and second class agricultural land.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EFFICIENCY OF THE PERSONNEL OF THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17710) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read the amendment, which is the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Clerk read the proposed amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of district superintendents in the United States Life-Saving Service shall be as follows: For the superintendents of the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth districts, $2,200 per annum each; for the superintendents of the third and ninth districts, $2,000 per annum each; for the superintendent of the eighth district, $1,900 per annum. That the pay of keepers of life-saving stations shall be $1,000 per annum each, and that the pay of the No. 1 surfman in each of the crews of the life-saving stations shall be at the rate of $70 per month.

SEC. 2. That every keeper of a life-saving station and every surfman in the Life-Saving Service of the United States shall be entitled to receive one ration per day or, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, commutation therefor at the rate of 30 cents per ration.

SEC. 3. That section 8 of the act of May 4, 1882, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving station shall hereafter die by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or a child or children under 16 years of age, or a dependent mother, such widow and child or children and dependent mother shall be entitled to receive, in equal portions, during a period of two years, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the same amount, payable quarterly as far as practicable, that the husband or father or son would be entitled to receive as pay if he were alive and continued in the Service: Provided, That if the widow shall remarry at any time during the said two years her portion of said amount shall cease to be paid to her from the date of her remarriage, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries under the provisions of this section, if there be any; and if any child shall arrive at the age of 16 years during the said two years, the portion of such child shall cease to be paid to such child from the date on which such age shall be attained, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries, if there be any."

SEC. 4. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear something about what the bill is.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, the bill is to increase the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service. It is a fact well known by those who live in the vicinity of life-saving stations and know about the work there that the service has become somewhat inefficient, owing to the class of men which they have been compelled to hire. The fact is these men should be experienced men. They are not experienced men now. There are about 2,000 men in the service, 500 of whom are inexperienced men, and to encourage enlistment of the better class of men and to maintain the service it is desirable that they should be offered some better inducement to come in.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much do you propose to raise the wages?

Mr. LOVERING. The wages of the surfmen, which make up a large part of the bill, is to be at the rate of $9 a month, practically, which is equivalent to rations of 30 cents a day.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is, the only increase in the bill is to provide for the computation of rations?

Mr. LOVERING. It increases the salary of the superintendents about $200 each, and it increases the salary of the keepers $100 each, and it increases the salary of the first-class surfmen, who are practically lieutenants of the keeper, $100.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much will it cost in all?

Mr. LOVERING. Two hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this a unanimous report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. LOVERING. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The chief expense is the increase of the salary of the officers, is it not?

Mr. LOVERING. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The chief expense is in the rations being increased $9 a month.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The surfmen are poorly paid under existing conditions, and there is no provision for the pensioning of surfmen.

Mr. MANN. They get two years' pay.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill proposes to give a pension to the dependent mothers and children?

Mr. LOVERING. It extends it to the dependent mothers.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the bill is along the right lines.

Mr. MANN. It is a very conservative bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the bill goes far enough.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state what change this makes in section 8?

Mr. LOVERING. Section 8 is existing law. It extends the benefit to the dependent mother. There are about 20 per cent of the men employed in this service who do not have wives, but they do have dependent mothers that prevent them from entering the service, and this takes care of the dependent mothers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The only addition that is made to section 8 is the including of the dependent mother.

Mr. LOVERING. That is all; that is every word of it.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand that provision is made so that No. 1 surfmen in each of the crews shall receive $70 per month. Does that apply to any of the other surfmen?

Mr. LOVERING. It does not. I will explain that to the gentlemen. The No. 1 surfman is liable to be called upon to take the place of the keeper at any time, and he is required to be of the very highest class of men that we have there. He is frequently and almost always, when occasion requires, promoted to the position of keeper. That man is raised $5 a month only.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. I understand that the surfmen get $65 per month now.

Mr. LOVERING. Yes.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. And they serve only eight months in the year.

Mr. LOVERING. They serve on the Pacific coast twelve months in the year. They serve on the Lakes eight months in the year, and they serve on the Atlantic coast ten months in the year.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they paid for the entire year?

Mr. LOVERING. They are paid only for the time they serve.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. I desire to state that I have introduced a bill to give to the surfmen who work only eight months a year, and who receive only $65 a month, half of their regular salary during the four months they are not employed, during which time they have very hard work finding employment. I think it would be but fair that they should be thus paid.

Mr. LOVERING. I can only say that I sympathize with the gentleman absolutely.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a word. In my opinion, this is one of the most commendable bills which has ever been presented to this House. I know something of the life-savers of our country, and I know their story of self-sacrifice and heroism. It is one of the brightest pages in American history. These men deserve well of the Government. Their heroic deeds on our coasts speak in trumpet tones in their behalf. They are the life-savers of the Republic, and the hardest worked and the bravest and most efficient men in the public service. They should get more pay and more credit for what they do, and I will go as far as any man in the country in their behalf. I am their friend, and I want to help them, in Congress or out of Congress, in any way I can. All honor and all glory to our brave and heroic and noble life-savers. [Applause.] I hope the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOVERING. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I don't know that there will be any opposition to this bill. I do not think there should be any. I myself was at first not inclined to agree to its passage, but after a full hearing and investigation by the committee, of which I am a member; after listening to witnesses, the men who appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, relate their services and their trials and their dangers and their saving of human life, and the small compensation they receive, I concluded that instead of extending and increasing the expenditures for the Army and Navy to kill people we could well afford to increase the pay of these men, and that we would spend our money to much better purpose in giving it to these men who in time of peace and at all times devote their energies and lives to the saving of human life from the perils and dangers of the sea. Nor do I believe the provision in this bill which takes care of the man who is injured in the service is in the nature of a civil pension. I think also it is right to extend the benefits of the present law to the dependent mother, for I believe Congress can well afford to extend the present law which provides for the wife and children of the man who has lost his life in the service to the dependent mother. The man who is injured in the public service in the business of saving lives should be provided for; and those who are dependent upon him, the wife, the child, or the mother, should be cared for. I trust the bill will pass. The men in the Service are at present but poorly paid; and this bill does but scant justice to the men in a branch of the public service whose chief duties are to save human lives. And the record of these men as shown to us demonstrate that many of them are heroes indeed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOVERING, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members have leave to print on the bill just passed for ten legislative days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMPLETING PEDIMENT OF HOUSE WING OF CAPITOL.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17983) for completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the expenditure of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, authorized for the purpose of completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol by placing suitable statuary thereon, said expenditure to be made under the direction of the Speaker of the House, the Joint Committee on the Library, and the Architect of the Capitol.

With the following amendments:

Strike out the word "Architect" and insert the word "Superintendent."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

MANUFACTURE, ETC., OF ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER IN HAWAII.

Mr. KIMBALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16643) to ratify an act of the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii authorizing the manufacture, distribution, and supply of electric light and power in the district of Lahaina, county of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

During the reading:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to the consideration of that bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman withhold his objection to let the gentleman explain the bill? It is an important measure. It has the unanimous support of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that, but I would object after the explanation was given. It is ridiculous to consider it by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Possibly the gentleman, out of the abundance of his information, might be able to point out to the gentleman wherein it is unconstitutional.

Mr. MANN. I think anybody in the House could do it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think that is doubtful.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

EXEMPTION OF HOSPITAL SHIPS.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4377, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4377) to carry into effect the international convention of December 21, 1904, relating to the exemption in time of war of hospital ships from dues and taxes on vessels.

Whereas a convention providing for the exemption of hospital ships in time of war from the payment of all dues and taxes imposed for the benefit of the State was signed at The Hague on December 21, 1904, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, China, Korea, Denmark, Spain, Mexico, France, Greece, Italy, Japan, Luxemburg, Montenegro, the Netherlands, Peru, Persia, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Servia, Siam, and Switzerland; and

Whereas the said convention was duly ratified by the Government of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and was proclaimed by the President of the United States May 21, 1907: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That hospital ships, concerning which the conditions set forth in articles 1, 2, and 3 of the convention concluded at The Hague on July 29, 1899, for the adaptation to maritime warfare of the principles of the Geneva convention of August 22, 1864, are fulfilled, shall, in the ports of the United States and the possessions thereof, be exempted in time of war from all dues and taxes imposed on vessels by the laws of the United States, and from all pilotage charges.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall by proclamation name the hospital ships to which this act shall apply, and shall indicate the time when the exemptions herein provided for shall begin and end.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, as the Chair understands it, this is a Senate bill. The request is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from further consideration of the bill, with the statement that a similar House bill has been reported and is on the Calendar, and the request is to consider the Senate bill?

Mr. COUSINS. It is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from further consideration of the bill H. R. 14931, which is identical with this Senate bill, and that the Senate bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. But that bill is on the Calendar and the Senate bill is before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COUSINS. The House bill has been reported unanimously.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the Senate bill has been referred, as the Chair is informed, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COUSINS. Precisely.

The SPEAKER. And now the request is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the consideration of the Senate bill and consider the same, and that the House bill lie upon the table?

Mr. COUSINS. That is the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COUSINS a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, with Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, in pursuance of the original agreement, I now yield one hour of time, or so much thereof as he may need, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate myself upon the opportunity to address the House upon "St. Patrick's Day in the Morning." I presume the honor is accorded me because I so seldom trespass upon the patience of the House by talking from the floor.

Mr. Chairman, I have rarely in my service in this House claimed the privilege of talking upon this floor, and if you will indulge me briefly I wish to express some of the thoughts that have come to me touching the general good.

I feel profoundly the responsibility of being a Member of the Congress of the United States at a time so fraught with tremendous consequence both to our nation and to civilization.

I listened with very great interest to the eloquent panegyric pronounced the other day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] on the President of the United States and his wonderful message. I concur with him fully in many of the things he said. It is gratifying to hear such unqualified approval of the attitude of this Republican Administration come from the other side of this House.

I can not refrain at this time from expressing my indignation at the criticism that has been heaped upon the President's head by the press and by certain public speakers who have attempted to characterize Roosevelt as the destroyer of prosperity, the cause of the recent financial troubles. It is said that he should have proceeded to work the wonderful revolution and reformation that is already assured in our business and political life in a quieter, gentler way. I read one article that went forward at some length to describe how the gentle and lovable McKinley would have proceeded to have reformed and brought under supervision the pirates that have raided our interstate commerce and levied unjust tribute upon our iron highways of trade and travel between the cities. It is said that he should have called them together and had a conference with them, remonstrated with them, showed them that it was inevitable, that these reforms would have to come, and that they would have seen the wisdom of his advice, and that all this mighty revolution would, under him, have been accomplished without any injury to business.

This could all have been done quietly, it is said, without angering anybody, and that the strenuous President now in the White House with his big stick has frightened business and terrified legitimate interests and is the cause of the panic; and every reactionary statesman in America, every advocate of graft, every defender of the old régime has become a calamity howler predicting disaster to business if we do not abandon the clear line of duty so plainly indicated in his message by this heroic, fearless champion of justice and honesty.

The mere statement of such unreasoning criticism brings a smile of derision to the face of every Member of this House who was a Member of the House when the rate bill was first proposed and while it progressed by slow stages toward its completion.

No one appreciates as does a member of the legislature himself the absolute necessity of the big stick and of the strenuous champion, the dauntless and fearless leader in the inauguration of this wonderful work which our President has commenced.

No one has a more profound admiration nor a deeper feeling of respect for the sainted McKinley than I. He was the most universally beloved and respected of all the citizens, living or dead, of my native State. His fame is the brightest jewel in the crown of the great district whose Representative upon the floor of this House I now have the honor to be. While admirably adapted to do the work that he did, he would have been utterly unable to accomplish what Roosevelt has achieved.

He had his work to do and he did it well. He has established forever and firmly fixed to endure, I trust, the great principle of American protection; but the work of this Administration required a big stick, a big stick that could not have been wielded by his gentle hands. Why, his best endeavors would not have produced even a ripple upon the seething pool of business and political corruption which the eloquent gentleman from New York so graphically described.

It is fresh in the memory of all of us, when the debates in the House were in progress, how many eloquent eulogies were paid to the efficiency of railroad-rate makers; how it was insisted that they had a monopoly of all the intelligence that was capable of fixing a rate upon the railroads, and what pathetic appeals were made to the House not to confiscate the stocks of widows and orphans invested in the railroads by Members of that House, who must have known that the money of widows and orphans was invested in the minority stocks of the roads, while in many instances the entire earnings of the railroads were given away in rebates to the interests which held the majority of the stock. Yet, if I remember aright, every Member of this House, except seven, after that provision had been pending for some time, was compelled by the "big stick" which had been transferred to their constituents at home, to vote for that bill.

The President has not been polite enough. He has been too strenuous. He has dared to speak the words "predatory wealth" and "rich malefactors," and the very utterance of these words has disturbed the trade of this country and brought on a panic. If his critics had lived two thousand years ago, what a storm of indignation they would have expressed when the Christ of Nazareth lashed the money changers indignantly from God's own temple! These money changers were business men, men of great consequence, in old Jerusalem. Doubtless they had concessions from those high in the government and should have been treated with more consideration and courtesy. The record does not disclose whether this conduct on the part of the Saviour produced a panic or not, but it undoubtedly did occasion some disturbance of business. But the world has not much cared.

Neither do the American people care whether the struggle for commercial and industrial liberty—this great, spontaneous movement in the direction of business honesty and fairer competition—caused the panic or not. They have set their faces toward its complete accomplishment.

Did ever the Anglo-Saxon race, when roused in the cause of justice and freedom, pause to count the cost? They will not now. This work must go on. No power on this earth can stop it. The victory is already assured. The organized forces of opposition to the policies of the President are falling into disorder and confusion and will soon be in full retreat. Before the next Presidential election the battle will be substantially over.

The eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] advocates the selection for President of a crusader, to use his own words. Yes, he wants a crusader, he says—the peerless leader.

I am reminded of a talk I once had with an old civil war veteran whose service had been with the infantry and he was greatly prejudiced in favor of that branch of the service.

The cavalry—

Said he—

are held away back out of danger while the battle rages, until the lines of the enemy are broken and they are flying from the field. Then the cavalry charge with bugles blowing, sabers flashing, all yelling like—like fury. They throw the enemy into hysterics and wind the whole performance up in a blaze of glory.

The crusade was the most stupendous exhibition of organized foolery recounted in all the annals of history. As a display of enthusiasm, although insanely misdirected, it was sublime.

And in this regard the peerless leader would be indeed a crusader. I congratulate the gentleman from New York on his simile. His candidate is not wholly without experience in the crusading business. It is scarcely eight years since his peerless crusader showed to the world what he could do in that line. You all remember the splendid enthusiasm, the wonderful concerted action of his first crusade. He, followed by over six million of the weak-minded, charged and yelled and crusaded over the country for free silver coined at a ratio of 16 to 1.

The esprit de corps of that crusade was as perfect as was that of the crusade which went in quest of the Holy Sepulcher. Whatever the peerless leader did, they all did. When he charged, they all charged. When he yelled, they yelled. When he shouted for free silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, they said "Sixteen to one!"

For enthusiasm and concert of action that demonstration has never been surpassed. We have in Sacred Writ, however, the story of a like devotion to a single idea, a like concert of multitudinous action on the part of that herd of swine, also possessed of the devil, that went charging and squealing down into the sea and were drowned. Why, my Democratic friends, for enthusiasm and devotion you can never beat that! They were all drowned, every mother's pig of them!

Do the gentlemen think the country would appreciate another exhibition? We all know that the peerless leader, the star performer, is now ready. If we may believe the current press, he is out himself billing the principal cities for the show.

Let us be serious and inquire where in the procession of events we are now. We have been engaged in a tremendous struggle against a commercial feudalism that has grown almost supreme in its imperial power. But look about you. The strongest of its embattled castles have already capitulated. The white flag is flying over many of those strongholds where once they took tribute from our interstate commerce. In their council chambers a mighty change has come. The shipper walks in standing straight up as an American citizen should. He is not to-day cringing and begging for the same rate as the most-favored shipper. He no longer leaves that presence with tears flowing down his face, while some insolent baron says, "Sell out or be ruined." He goes forth with a feeling akin to pity for the anxious men who are there soberly studying the Constitution and the rate bill.

The last authoritative utterance that comes to us from the Standard Oil Company, the strongest and oldest and of all the great corporations the most persistent offender, is an announcement to the public that it is ready to be good. Mr. Archbold, in his speech at the banquet in New York, advocated a national license for corporations, clearly conceding and declaring the legislative power and duty to control great interstate traders. In a former article he said that he favored complete publicity on the part of that company. What more does the public want? Graft, duress, and every form of extortion flees before the blazing light of publicity.

Now, what are we going to do with the Standard Oil Company and kindred organizations? We are nearing a reconstruction period, and everyone who soberly considers the signs of the times knows that the war is over. The President has transferred the big stick from his own mighty grasp to many millions of hands over this country, and has taught them how to use it.

If there is any doubt about this, gentlemen, I would point to Ohio, and there you may see with what relentless zeal that head is clubbed which opposes the President's policies in opposition to the people's will, no difference how that head may be crowned with past honors and dignities. Past service to the public, no matter how great, eloquence and ability universally recognized, can not interpose or save.

Nowhere in this great land of ours can criticism of the President, inspired by hate and spleen, win applause, save in the shadow of the stock exchange in Wall street.

From this time on, no political party can formulate a platform looking toward any recession, any reactionary movement, any going backward. The work of the next Administration will necessarily be a work of business reconstruction, and in determining what shall be done with the Standard Oil Company we should bear in mind that that great organization is one of the most splendidly devised business institutions that the world has ever known, capable of doing enormous good in the future. To destroy it utterly, while it might give amusement and passing delight to a charging crusader, would be an economic crime against society.

At this time it seems to me not inappropriate to glance backward to an almost complete analogy in history, and I trust the American people will be able to profit by the wisdom of their fathers.

Many chapters back in the great epic of civil liberty civil government rose from the ruins of the feudal system after a fierce struggle. When the power of the barons was broken no doubt there were many who advocated their utter destruction, but soberer counsel prevailed and they were not killed. They were spanked well, and when they manifested a disposition to be good they were given place in the new state and became honored and useful pillars in Liberty's reconstructed temple.

Such should now be the treatment accorded the predatory trusts. We must spank them until they consent to be good; formulate and enact such laws as will insure performance on their part.

This will be the work of the next Administration. And it can't be done by the Democrats charging and yelling under the leadership of a crusader. We have reached the time when it is more important to go right than to go fast. There is no danger that more seriously menaces the public good than misdirected zeal.

The President in nearly all of his public utterances has said this:

> It is as important to have a firm hand upon the brake as to wield the whip.

He has iterated and reiterated this warning to the American people until it appears that that marvelous, comprehensive mind must have had a premonition that the Democratic party would get full of enthusiasm and start to crusading again.

There is danger. At any moment Mr. Bryan may promulgate some idea that has got crosswise in his brain and stampede the whole Democratic herd. We must now address ourselves to the enactment of conservative legislation under the constitutional power to regulate commerce, having in view the establishment by law of the doctrine of the "square deal," comprehending absolute freedom of trade in our interstate commerce and the reestablishment of old-fashioned, generous competition among business men.

Having these things in view, the American people would do well to choose for their next President the great, constructive statesman, the profound constitutional lawyer.

He must bring to the public service ability and training for the task of the highest order. It is not an erratic enthusiast, talking of Government possession of railroads, that we need to lead us into untried paths of experiment, but an Executive of judgment and discrimination to advise legislation that will bring the railroads back to first principles, make them again to be public highways, public property under the control of public trustees serving all the people alike. The new legislation, imperatively demanded to make competition fair and restrain certain interstate traders called "trusts," must be formulated by those who at least are able to discriminate between the good and the bad, between the rich corporation which does right and the rich corporation which does wrong. This being admitted, we may eliminate every Democrat from the Presidential problem. For on that side of the House have you not railed against the tobacco trust and the United States Steel Company with equal virulence? With a like fury you would charge on both, because, forsooth, both are rich. The one is a pirate, sandbagging its competitors, driving them to the wall, and ruining them by every species of crime against competition that wicked avarice and cunning have been able to invent. The other has competed fairly and generously with every competitor in the same business. I know whereof I speak. The independent iron and steel works have prospered equally with those of the great corporation.

I know how strenuously you on that side of the House will combat this declaration of mine, that this great company has been fair in its dealings with all others in the iron business. It seems almost a party necessity for you to do so; for have you not in your party platforms declared for the destruction of the trusts, and promised the country to destroy them by administering to them free trade when you should come into power? You all know full well that your specific remedy, your trusticide, will not hurt the tobacco trust, nor the beef trust, nor the Standard Oil Company, nor the sugar trust, nor any of the monopolies, except by impoverishing the whole country and thereby rendering them less prosperous.

It is very, very important, that the next President must be one who will not deem it his duty to be unfriendly to any great corporation merely because it is rich.

Our next President should be a Republican. There are many names of great Republicans eminently qualified for the responsibility before the country. We Republicans are divided in our choice for President, but not divided in our admiration for or appreciation of those great statesmen who are now being loyally supported by their respective States for this great place.

In this spirit of enthusiastic appreciation for the splendid merits of all his rivals, my native State, Ohio, at the recent convention brought forward her favorite son and presented his name proudly to the nation. She unanimously urges him as the logical candidate to carry forward in unbroken sequence the great work of this Administration.

He is a great jurist, deeply learned in the science of the law; an accomplished statesman, knowing the needs of society and the legitimate scope and functions of civil government, and he has shown himself to be a great administrative officer. If he is nominated he will inspire the American people with a confidence that they have rarely ever felt in any candidate. He will carry his native State by the largest majority ever there polled, save only that marvelous vote given to President Roosevelt. He was an able and a just judge, an efficient governor-general of the Philippines, a great War Secretary, and if nominated and elected he will be a patriotic and efficient Chief Magistrate, bringing glory and prestige to the nation as his ancestors brought honor and renown to his native State. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. I do not see the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS] present. I would like to have him consume some of his time.

Mr. BURLESON. I will act for the gentleman from Mississippi, and I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES].

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, it is always a delight to hear a Republican speak, but it is quite an anomaly to hear a Republican try to explain a panic. We have heard so often from that side of the House an entirely different character of speech to the one heard to-day. Our friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY], tells us that 6,000,000 weak-minded men followed the standard of Mr. Bryan. I want to say in reply to that, Mr. Chairman, that what Mr. Bryan advocated was a dollar which you said was worth only 50 cents. But as much as you denounced that, the Republican side of the House, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, has brought forward a bill here at this session, by unanimous report, with the exception of one, or perhaps two, Republicans, not to coin that despised and hated dollar worth only 50 cents, as you said, for which weak-minded men fought, as our friend declared, but wanting to foist upon the country a dollar worth only 5 cents in reality, and God Almighty only knows what prospectively it would be worth. It would all depend upon the condition of the market and the price the assets brought. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What must be the character of imbecility upon that side of the House, if we have weak-minded men, I should regret to say. In 1896 we fought for more money to meet the business needs of the country. Then the per capita was only $21. The Republicans said we had enough money. What the country needed, as they declared, was confidence, not more money. Yet, Mr. Chairman, with the discoveries of gold and the addition to our currency, we have now the great per capita of $35.60—more than any other country in the civilized world except France—almost an increase of 100 per cent over 1896. Yet the country is in a panic and the cry from all quarters is more money. What would have been the awful plight and wreck of our country and property values if we were at the per capita which you Republicans said was enough and an abundance staggers the imagination.

Soup houses, panics, Democratic adversity wrought upon the country have been the stock arguments heretofore of the Republicans in their speeches to which we have listened. Why, we have listened so often to the siren tones of that eloquent gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], the most impassioned and brilliant orator upon that side, as he would shake that white head and tell us of the soup houses and of the idle men and of the reduced wages by reason of Democratic administration, and of how Republicans always brought prosperity. We hear no more a sound from that sweet lute. We hear no more the delightful tones of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as he enswoons us when taking us upon a delightful excursion, which he personally conducts every Congress, unfolding to us the delightful panorama of the flaming furnaces and belching smokestacks, the hum and whir of busy machinery, happy men at work and contented with a full dinner pail, singing the sweet song of Republican prosperity. How is it now? No more do you hear him upon that most interesting subject. That nightingale, too, has been silenced. And instead we hear the sad story, which I shall read, a dispatch from his home:

SOUP HOUSE OPENS IN PITTSBURG, WHERE THE CRY OF DISTRESS HAS GROWN STRONGER—15,000 IDLE.

PITTSBURG, PA., February 8.—The cry of the unemployed daily grows more distressed in Pittsburg. There are 15,000 men idle, and the specter of the dreaded soup house again makes its appearance. The first soup house will be opened by the Salvation Army Monday morning, and unless there is some radical and prompt change for the better more places of this kind will be in demand before many days have elapsed.

The situation is not really alarming, but it is bad enough. Soup houses have been the dread of the business men and civic leaders, and every effort has been made to avoid them.

The Republican party forced to go into partnership with the Salvation Army to feed the unemployed in soup houses now! [Applause.]

But we heard also the speech about prosperity from our distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], when he enraptured us with the delightful strains that Democracy meant panic, that Republicanism meant prosperity. We heard him as he read from Southern newspapers telling about prosperity in Dixie land, and we listened with rapturous delight as he enumerated all the evidences of prosperity of our land. But that harp since then has ceased its strains, and the last time he was seen upon this floor he was reading the Holy Bible and trying to prove that Cæsar was entitled to certain tribute. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, the truth of it is, Mr. Chairman—

The harp that once, through Congress halls,
The soul of prosperity music shed
Now hangs as mute on Congress walls
As if DALZELL, BOUTELL, and LANDIS were dead!

[Great laughter and applause.]

But you have got the soup houses, gentlemen. The burden upon you is to explain it. Two million idle men begging for work, reduced wages for those fortunate enough to have employment—this is the melancholy story of the acme of Republican legislation.

Mr. Chairman, Secretary Taft, upon whose shoulders the mantle of Theodore Roosevelt is to fall, speaking at Columbus, August 16, 1907, used the following language:

A graduated income tax would also have a tendency to reduce the motive for the accumulation of enormous wealth, but the Supreme Court has held an income tax not to be a valid exercise of power by the Federal Government. The objection to it from a practical standpoint is its inquisitorial character and the premium it puts on perjury. In times of great national need, however, an income tax would be of great assistance in furnishing means to carry on the Government and it is not free from doubt how the Supreme Court, with changed membership, would view a new income tax law under such conditions. The court was nearly evenly divided in the last case, and during the civil war great sums were collected without judicial interference, and as it was then supposed within the Federal power.

This is an unusual announcement coming from such a profound source. Admitting, as he does, the equity and fairness of an income tax, he announces the strange and unusual doctrine that the fortunes of thousands of millions of this country and of the great corporations of this land, aggregating many billions of money, must escape taxation until some great national need is upon the land, permitted, as they are now, to place a sickle into harvests they have not tended, to gather from fields they have not tilled, rolling in opulence and luxury, that the taxgatherer must not visit them, but instead, he must frequent the cottage and the cabin and gather from the great plain people the revenue for the Government. This is a remarkable argument, sir, in view of the fact that these fortunes have grown with such rapidity and to such an abnormal size that they are called by the President himself swollen fortunes, though, perhaps, he might have more appropriately said stolen fortunes. [Applause.]

By what character of argument can he undertake to exonerate these men from aiding in some degree in bearing the burdens of government, which offers them such fertile fields for remuneration? But even in this the Secretary exposes a startling lack of knowledge of the history of the party whose standard he desires to bear. His party had an opportunity in time of great national need to place this income-tax law upon the statute books. In 1898 when this country was engaged in war with a foreign power, this opportunity was afforded his party. The Democrats in that Congress offered as an amendment to the war revenue bill an income-tax law that made the mighty fortunes of this land bear some part of the burdens of the Government. The poor man was then not only paying the taxes, giving freely of his treasure, but he was offering up his life upon the field of contest that others might enjoy the same liberty that his forefathers wrung from the army of Cornwallis. [Applause.] On April 29, 1898, the Democratic party in the House, by the minority leader [Mr. BAILEY], offered an income-tax bill, but the Republican party, true to its record, when the Democrats were trying to lay upon these men's accumulation of wealth an income tax, asking that out of their abundance they should give a pittance, the millionaires of the country cried out to the Republican party, those who had contributed thousands to prostitute the electorate and purchase the election, to remember their Creator in the days of their power that their time in office might be long, and with absolute unanimity they voted this measure down. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] And what will the country say, the millions of American voters, when their attention is called to the fact that the probable nominee of the Republican party announces that they might do in the future what they have failed to do in the past? One of the causes of the war with Great Britain, when the colonies were marshaling their forces in armed conflict, was taxation without representation. The very converse of this proposition is true in America to-day. These men who hold these great fortunes, these great corporations whose wealth mounts into the millions, have representation, great representation, powerful representation, without taxation, and one is as unjust as the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, in the Fifty-eighth Congress, when speaking on this subject, I used the following language:

I say, Mr. Chairman, that we are glad to welcome the President to the Democratic platform. Many good planks are in it, and as he is now securely fixed in the Presidential chair for the term for which he was elected, no more to be a candidate, as he himself has declared, let him become the tribune of the poor, let him wield the righteous sword of the common people. I look forward to the time when he will send a message to Congress saying that he wants this House to reform the tariff and put all trust-made articles on the free list; that he will go further and say that all articles manufactured in this country that are protected by a tariff and sold to foreigners cheaper than to citizens of this country shall be placed upon the free list; that he will ask us to effectually destroy the trusts by denying them the right of interstate commerce, and saying that when the fact is ascertained in any court of competent jurisdiction that an article is trustized it shall not be sold outside of the State of its production; and that he will ask us to deny them the use of the United States mails; that he will take a fearless stand for the suppression of private monopolies.

All these planks are in the Democratic platform. We are willing to follow him along these lines. Let him send a message to this House saying that we ought to go back to the pristine days when the immense fortunes of this country did not escape taxation, when the tax-gatherer visited the palaces of the rich as well as the hovels and cottages of the poor, and let him ask us to rehabilitate the income-tax law and place it upon the statute book, and see if the Supreme Court, with its change of personnel, has not changed its position upon this most equitable of all ways to defray the burdens of government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I indulged the hope here on February 8, 1905, that the President of the United States would send a message to the Congress asking for the rehabilitation of the income-tax law. I am gratified beyond measure to see that three years after that time the President did send to Congress a message asking us to pass an income-tax law and place it upon the statute books. But what answer has his party made to this request? You will look in vain to see any legislation of this character attempted by the Republicans, and what shall the country say of the Republican party, which, in power for eleven years in every department of the Government, has placed upon the bended backs of the toiling millions of this land the revenue burdens which they have borne, and are just waking up at the eleventh hour to find out that the Democratic party has been right on the question of the income tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Eleven years finds Mr. Roosevelt proclaiming and Mr. Taft asserting that the income tax is just, and yet these same gentlemen belong to a party, and doubtless indulged in it themselves, which denounced Mr. Bryan as an anarchist and a malefactor against his Government because he proclaimed a decade ago the righteousness of such a law and that it should be placed upon the statute books.

Mr. Chairman, the conduct of the Republican party of governmental affairs for twelve years demonstrates beyond controversy, to my mind, one thing, and that is if the word "hypocrite" should be lost to the English tongue, the word "Republican" would stand for it still. We have seen them change position upon every public question until the shuttlecock, in comparison, could not be mentioned in the same day. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] One year they are standing pat on a tariff that is the acme of human production; the next year they are promising a reduction of it. They used to tell us that the tariff was not a tax paid by the consumer. Then, when driven from that position by the obvious proof that the monopoly or trust protected added the price of the tariff and made the consumer pay it, they announced the doctrine that it was only the difference in wages paid laborers in different countries as compared with Americans. For seven long years Theodore Roosevelt has been President of the United States. This tariff has needed reforming and with all his vaunted courage, he has not yet summoned himself up to that notch where he has challenged the aggregate monopolies of the country to a contest with the American people in favor of the destruction of their monopolies. But here, on the eve of a national campaign, we are told not only by this distinguished gentleman, but by his protégé, that the tariff will be revised after the election. Why not revise it now? Why have you waited all these years, with absolute control of the Government, to change this tariff law, which you now admit has produced the great monopolies of this country? Why wait until after the election? Is it because you are afraid for the American people to pass upon your conduct, or is it because you fear the trusts if you revise it in the interests of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Indeed, is it not because you fear the wrath of the people if the revision is not along lines favorable to them, and the tightening of the purse strings of the great trusts and monopolies if the revision of the tariff is not favorable to them? Article 460 of this Dingley tariff law which I hold in my hand places a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem upon harvesters, reapers, cultivators, and thrashing machines, and these things which are used by the farmers to till the earth and woo from the soil the substance which feeds the world. You place a tariff tax upon them of 20 per cent ad valorem, but in your charity to the American farmer you put on the free list article 466, acorns, dried or undried, but not unground. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And again, the equity of this great production, upon which the Republican party has been standing pat, this model tariff law, places hats, bonnets, hoods, men, women, and children's clothing upon the taxed list of $2 per hundred and 20 per cent ad valorem. But to show your great kindness and charity to the American people (art. 596) you place leeches upon the free list. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, if there is a country in the world in which there are blood suckers and leeches, it certainly is the United States, and if there is any one thing upon which I would favor a prohibitive tariff as high as heaven, it would be on leeches. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] But the magnanimity of the Republican tariff offers them to the American people without taxation. You place a tax of 6 cents a pound on tobacco that enables the trust to control the market and fix the price not only to the producer, but to the consumer as well. In article 684, out of the abundance of an overflowing heart, you put tobacco stems on the free list.

Mr. Chairman, I imagine I can hear a conversation that goes on in the rooms of the Ways and Means Committee between the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], when they were considering this Dingley tariff law, when the latter said to the former: "Well, we put clothing on the taxed list, we put farming implements on the taxed list, we put kitchen utensils on the taxed list, now what shall we put on the free list? The people have got to have something; they are getting pretty hot."

I can hear the gentleman from New York as his great heart wells up in his reply: "You say the people are getting pretty hot?"

"Yes," says Mr. DALZELL, "they are." "Well, let us put ice on the free list then." And this is what they did. [Prolonged laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Article 578 places ice on the free list. Mr. Speaker, you absolutely do allow English ice to be imported into this country without taxation. I had always thought up to this time that notwithstanding the country had fallen upon evil days and many burdens had been visited upon it, such as the continued rule of the Republican party, that the Lord still loved us enough to send the winter to freeze our lakes, our ponds, and our rivers, that we might have ice without importing it. But the Republican party is wise; it peers far into the future, and if they knew they were given unbridled control of the Government for twelve years the monopolies and trusts would make it so infernally hot that water would not freeze, and, therefore, they put ice on the free list. In fact, sir, after putting every article in daily use in the homes of the land on the taxed side of the tariff law the Republican party turned and gave, in its great and unusual charity to the American people, one other thing. Article 623 places nux vomica on the free list. I presume that this was done because they knew that after the voters of the country had swallowed the Republican party and its principles, nux vomica would be very much needed. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, I would like to suggest——

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Oh, I yield only for a question; my time is limited.

Mr. KEIFER. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he remembered that in previous tariff bills we had peanuts voted for unanimously on the Democratic side in the way of a high protective tariff, and also sumac, that grows in the poor hills in the region of Lynchburg, Va.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I suppose we voted for peanuts because we knew that if you Republicans continued in power, the people would be devilish lucky if they could get hold of anything at all. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. And the Democratic party wanted to protect peanuts against the roasted peanuts of Spain.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Oh, I will be glad to discuss peanuts with the gentleman some other time. [Laughter.] But I want to call attention to some other things. Now when you come to reform this tariff, and my friend has talked about the Standard Oil, there are some things here on the free list that you ought to allow to remain sacred. This is a great production, this tariff bill, and I do not wonder that the distinguished leaders on that side halt considerably when we talk about revising it. Your charity, my friends, to the American people has been so great that in their interest and on their behalf I protest against your undertaking to reform this tariff; that is, unless you allow to remain sacred forever this free list. Think of it! Here is article 588, old junk. That is also placed on the free list. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Every farmer in the country and every laboring man that gets old junk can thank God there is no tariff tax upon that—that you have placed that on the free list. I do not wonder, as I said, Mr. Chairman, that this tariff bill is not to be touched; but I want to call your attention to the position of the Republican party when legislation of some real value is offered to the American people. You had an opportunity to vote upon different questions, and your record has been written. You can not change it. I know that you are trying to imitate Bryan, and I wish you would only do more of it, but your record has been written, and it is written in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this country. Here was an amendment offered—you talk about trusts—here was an amendment offered to you on June 2, 1900. This amendment was offered by Mr. Terry of Arkansas on behalf of the Democrats:

Whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the price of any commodity or article of merchandise has been enhanced in consequence of any monopoly, as defined in this act, he shall issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties or import taxes on like articles of merchandise or commodities brought from foreign countries. Such suspension shall continue as long as such enhancement in price of such commodity or article of merchandise exists and until revoked by the President.

How did our Republican friends vote then? You talk about the Standard Oil! To-day the President of the United States, whom you elected—we did not put him in power—if that amendment had passed, would have the power, if he believed that were a monopoly, as he must believe, to take the tariff off of oil and let oil come in free. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He would have not only that power, but he would have the power to take the tariff off of steel, if he believed there was a steel trust controlling the price of that commodity. But when you had an opportunity to vote on these questions the Republican party looked to the trusts and the trusts looked to the Republican party, and when the Democratic party was about to lay the ax to the very root of monopoly, which would destroy it, the trusts cried out to you for protection, and the cry was not in vain. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, that the tariff is used as a fomenter and protector of trusts no man conversant with the history of this country can deny. Statistics show that there are more than two hundred trusts in this country that are made possible by the tariff. Who can give any just reason why the tariff should be allowed to protect a trust or monopoly which is so mercenary, so forgetful of the people in this Government which offers to them its protection? They manufacture goods here and send them across the ocean, pay the freight, and sell them to foreigners in an unprotected market and charge less than they do to our own home people. And yet, if this amendment had been the law, it could have been used as a sword to cut down monopoly, and millions of dollars would have been saved to the people.

Under the Dingley law, section 3, you provide that the President shall have the power, by proclamation, to impose a tariff upon coffee, tea, and vanilla beans when he becomes convinced that any articles of our manufacture are dealt with unreasonably. You were quite willing to give the chance and right to the President to raise the tariff when some manufacturer was being discriminated against by foreign countries, but you were unwilling to give the American consumers, the millions of our countrymen who have made this country great, the benefit of such a law in their interests when manufacturers in their own country had monopolized against them and were discriminating against them in favor of the foreign consumer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not necessary, Mr. Chairman, to be sending long-drawn-out messages in pyrotechnic display before the country inveighing against dishonest methods—dishonesty in high places. With these I most cordially agree, yet the President, with a message of a dozen lines, could strike a blow for the American people that would be more effectual than a train load of such messages, if he will ask Congress to place upon the free list all articles that are manufactured or controlled by trusts in the United States. Why, only in this Congress, Mr. Chairman, when an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] providing that the agents of the United States in foreign countries should ascertain and obtain proof as to whether or not manufacturers in the United States were selling goods in foreign markets cheaper than at home the Republican party voted down the amendment and sustained the Speaker in ruling it out of order. We saw this illustrated in the Fifty-eighth Congress, when the Republicans voted to a man in favor of giving the armor-plate manufacturers a monopoly in armor plate for our Navy. An amendment was offered providing that not more than $398 per ton should be paid for armor plate.

The proof was incontrovertible that this profit was enormous and outrageous, and yet our Republican friends on the other side voted it down, and an amendment was offered providing that in case they were unable to purchase armor plate at these places the United States should manufacture it itself. That a monopoly existed in the manufacture of armor plate, there is no controversy, but the Republicans lined up in favor of the monopoly and voted down the amendment. When San Francisco had been wrecked by the great earthquake, when the hearts of the American people bled for these stricken people, when homes and fortunes of lifetime accumulation had been swept away, when Representatives on this floor opened the doors of the Treasury to provide for them, when alien people in distant lands gave of their substance to these people, a bill was introduced providing that those articles upon which a tariff appeared which would be needed in rebuilding this stricken city should be permitted to come into the country free of duty; but the Republican party was again to the rescue and voted it down. They were willing to take the people's money that had been gathered by taxation and give it to this city and these people, but the onslaught of monopoly and the iron hand of greed could not be loosened from the throat of this prostrate city. And so it was with Baltimore when that city was swept by flames, the glare of which could be seen from this Capitol, monopoly was permitted by the Republican party to feed upon these people in rebuilding that city.

We saw another evidence of the Republican party's friendship for the trusts when, on June 16, 1906, Mr. Sullivan, a Democrat from Massachusetts, offered the following amendment:

Provided, That no part of this provision shall be expended for material and supplies which are manufactured or produced in the United States, unless said articles are sold to the Isthmian Canal Commission at export prices, whenever such export prices are lower than the prices charged the consumer in the United States.

This was to deny the monopolies of the country the right to rob the Government in building the great Panama Canal. Yet, our Republican friends all rallied to the support of their Speaker, when he declared it out of order, and, on appeal by the Democrats, the Republicans voted to sustain him, and by that to allow the monopolies in this country to rob the Government in the sale of supplies in the building of this canal by charging more for them than they sell the same supplies to foreign purchasers for. Another evidence of the partnership that exists between the Republican party and the trusts was shown with striking force when the Democrats, on June 2, 1900, offered an amendment denying to any corporation, association, or joint stock company, operating or doing business in any State of the United States, the right of interstate commerce when it was organized and carried on for the purpose of controlling the manufacture or sale of any article of commerce; but our Republican friends again rallied to the support of the monopolies and voted this down. Another amendment was offered by the Democratic side denying to trusts and monopolies the use of the United States mails in aid or furtherance of their business or purpose to monopolize either the production or sale of any article of commerce, and the Republican party was again to the rescue of the trusts and voted this amendment down. So it is, Mr. Chairman. The whole history of the two political parties shows the Democratic side battling for the people against monopolies and the Republican party battling with monopolies against the people.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I heard the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], the other day, trying to prove that railroad rate legislation was a Republican doctrine. How did he prove it? By the declaration of his party platform? No. For in 1896 it was silent; in 1900 it was silent; in 1904 it was silent. That was a burning question then. A party is known by the principle it declares in its national convention and not by a bill introduced by some man here and yonder. But what are the real facts? The Democratic platform in 1896 demanded railroad rate regulation. As a crusader, it certainly brought forth good fruit. I care not who it was that took up this proposition so long as he fought along Democratic lines. The Republican party had the hearty support of the railroads in 1896 and 1900. I remember they had parades in Kentucky. They forced their men into them. They poured money from their treasury into the Republican fund to corrupt the voters. What was the result? They bought up the election for the Republican party. You came into power, and what did you do? Having been educated by the Democratic party, educated by Bryan, you heard the roar of discontent throughout the country by reason of discriminations and wrongs wrought upon the people of this country by the common carriers. You brought out the Townsend-Esch bill. What sort of a bill was that? Did it have the penitentiary penalty? It did not. I made a speech calling attention to this failure in the law and saying the only way to regulate the railroads was by providing a penitentiary penalty. The Hepburn bill came to this House without any such penalty. From my place upon this floor I offered an amendment providing for a penitentiary penalty, which Secretary Taft says is the only thing that vitalizes and makes powerful this law. How did you gentlemen vote? Every Republican upon that side of the House voted no. You wanted to fine them. You wanted the railroads to be speculating on the question as to whether they could steal more from the people than they could be fined by the courts. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I read from Secretary Taft's speech at Columbus, Ohio, of August 19, 1907. He says:

It is well understood that the Elkins bill was passed without opposition by, and with free consent of, the railroads, and that the chief reason for this was the elimination of the penitentiary penalty for unjust discriminations. The abolition of imprisonment as a possible penalty was unfortunate. Experience has shown that a mere fine is generally not enough to deter a corporation from violation of the law, because it then becomes a matter of mere business speculation. The imprisonment of two or three prominent officers of a railway company or a trust engaged in giving or receiving secret rebates, would have a greater deterrent for the future than millions in fine.

By this utterance Secretary Taft shows that the imprisonment penalty is all that vitalizes and makes powerful or effective the railroad rate law. Yet he does not give the credit to the Democratic party. The Republican party voted down the amendment which I offered providing for this imprisonment penalty, and when the bill went to the Senate, Senator Stone, a Democrat, offered the amendment providing for the penitentiary penalty, and it was incorporated into the law. So, it was not the Republicans, but the Democrats, who made this fight in the interests of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What an indictment against the Republican party in Congress made by a man in whose hands you want to place your standard, saying the Republican party in the Congress of the United States brought forward a bill here to do what? Give the railroads immunity from punishment with the full consent and the approval of the railroad companies. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party has announced to the country a new mode of warfare. It is—the people shall command and the leaders must obey. They have a leader; his name is upon every tongue; it is gravened on the heart of every Democrat. He has convictions and the courage to express them. He has stood for something, he has sown the good seed, and has raised in front of an army of the most merciless vultures the world ever saw the commandment "Thou shalt not steal." He is the one indeed who has never prostituted his giant intellect for money and never sold the love the American people bear him for corporation gold. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He cut the way through the wilderness of greed and was the pioneer. It's great to be a pioneer, Mr. Chairman; his path is always red with blood and wet with tears, but his name lives. The people of this Republic, at the coming election, are going to reward him, and the hand that will bear the Democratic standard is the same one that wielded the first sword in defense of the American people against organized greed. They only wait, sir, with restless anxiety the opportunity to elect that grand, that splendid, that matchless Democrat, William J. Bryan, President of the United States. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 17311. An act to authorize the Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a bridge over and across the Mobile River and its navigable channels on a line approximately east of the north boundary line of the city of Mobile, Ala.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4112) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 46.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Galveston Harbor as a whole, including Galveston Harbor, Galveston channel, Texas City channel, and Fort Bolivar channel, in the State of Texas, for the purpose of establishing a broad, comprehensive, and systematic plan for the future extension, enlargement, and deepening of said harbor so as to meet the growing needs of commerce, and to estimate the probable cost thereof.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] one hour's time, or such part thereof as he desires to take. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the pending measure. When the time comes to vote for it my vote will be found in favor of it.

I desire, however, this afternoon to speak upon another question that is not the question under discussion at this time. I desire to call the attention of the committee and of the country to the currency question. Prior to the civil war the stock of money and currency in this country was of two kinds—specie, which was the money, and State bank notes, which was the currency of the country. About one-half of the stock of currency and money in the country prior to the civil war consisted of State bank notes. The amount of circulation per capita at that time was a trifle over $13—I think, in exact figures, $13.65 per head. As I have said, a part of this currency was what we now call a credit or asset currency. In that portion of the State banks that issued currency based upon bonds many of the notes were never redeemed. That portion of the State banks that issued their notes upon the commercial credit of the country, that made a provision to redeem their notes over their own counters in gold, or made provision to redeem their notes at some redemption agency, never failed to make good their notes.

The war came, and we were compelled from necessity to adopt a different form, so far as our money and our currency were concerned. The Government, in the stress of war, issued demand notes, It issued United States notes, commonly known as "greenbacks." It later authorized the national banking system, and national-bank notes were issued and became a part of the stock of the money and currency of this country. In 1864, the period when the greenback ideas were most prevalent, when the greatest amount of United States notes were in circulation, we had then a per capita circulation of a trifle over $19 a head, and part of these notes were almost worthless. It took $2.85 of those United States notes to equal one dollar in gold. During that period specie payment was suspended. Only $25,000,000 of specie was in circulation, and that was upon the Pacific coast. The balance of our money and currency was of the kind of which I have spoken.

On March 2, 1908, the stock of money and currency in the United States consisted of gold coin $1,635,848,474. Almost one-half of our money and currency on the 2d day of March, 1908, was of gold coin or bullion, every dollar of which was worth 100 cents here or anywhere else in the world.

Our gold increased from January 1, 1879, up to March 2, 1908, seventeenfold. Our standard silver dollars to-day are $562,930,982. These silver dollars are worth 50 cents, intrinsically speaking; the other 50 cents is maintained by the faith and credit of the Republic. Likewise the subsidiary silver of $143,000,000. There is in circulation a trifle over $5,000,000 of Treasury notes of 1890, based upon the faith and credit of the country. There is in the stock of money and currency $346,000,000 of United States notes worth intrinsically not a farthing, but based upon the credit and faith of the Government and maintained at a parity by $150,000,000 of gold, making these notes worth 50 cents on the dollar and the other 50 cents based upon the faith and credit of the country, because there stands in the reserve funds of the United States $150,000,000 to maintain $346,000,000 of United States notes.

Then we come to national-bank notes. On March 2, 1908, there were $695,674,519 of national-bank notes, intrinsically not worth a farthing, based on the promise to pay of the United States, based upon the bonds, and the bonds are based upon the faith and credit of the United States.

We find that almost half of our stock of money and currency is asset currency, based upon the faith and credit of the United States, and has no intrinsic value. So far as the national-bank notes are concerned, they are about one and a half times or twice the amount they were in 1879. So that, to epitomize it, we have multiplied our gold, actual money, seventeen times since January 1, 1879. We have twice as much national-bank notes in circulation as we had in 1879.

We are confronted to-day with this question: As to how we can increase the stock of money and currency in the United States. It comes in from two sources. The one is through an increase of the specie, gold and subsidiary silver; the other is from an increase in the national-bank notes. There is no other way by which our stock of money and currency can be increased except in these two ways. Have we increased it, and, if so, how much? Turning to the records, I find that between August 1, 1907, and March 2, 1908, we added gold to our stock of money to the amount of $169,679,736; subsidiary silver, a trifle over $13,000,000; national-bank notes, $92,000,000; total, $267,000,000.

There are now pending in different branches of the Congress measures seeking to enlarge this country's currency, not money—mark the distinction—the currency of the country, not its money, to the extent of about $500,000,000. I find that from August 1, 1907, to March 2, 1908, we have increased our stock of money and currency more than half of what we are seeking to increase it by measures pending in the different branches of Congress, of which more than half of it is actual money; the other proposed increase is nothing more nor less than currency based upon the faith and credit of the country.

On August 1, 1907, I find from a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that the national-bank depositories held Government money to the extent of $145,000,000. On January 1, 1908, these same banks held Government money to the extent of $245,000,000. So that between the 1st of August, prior to the beginning of the supposed panic, up to January 1, 1908, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States put his hand in the Treasury—the people's Treasury—and drew therefrom $100,000,000 and placed it in the depository banks of this country, for which he received not a penny of interest. I was amazed, gentlemen of the House, when I found that the great State of Illinois, third in population and wealth, holding within its borders the second city on this continent, in point of wealth, commercial influence, and business, had less money deposited in the 395 national banks of the State of Illinois on the 31st day of December, 1907, than the one, single, solitary Standard Oil bank in the city of New York had at that same time. Three hundred and ninety-five banks in Illinois had $13,000,000 of the Government's funds and one bank in the city of New York had over $17,000,000 of the people's money at that same time. I have heard it said that there was at least a semblance of favoritism on the part of somebody somewhere in putting this money into these banks at the expense of the great State of Illinois and the balance of the United States during this critical period from August 1, 1907, to March 1, 1908.

I have looked over every measure pending in the Congress. I have been unable to find a solitary bill which seeks to correct this manifest executive favoritism through the departments of the executive branch of the Government placing money to this extent in the banks at the expense of the balance of the United States. The Fowler bill seeks to correct it. It is the only bill that does correct it, and it is time to correct it now. It is time that this kind of discretion under the law is stopped by this Congress. It is time we should say, "Thus far shalt thou go and no further." And yet we find that one set of banks that might probably be called "system banks" has in the neighborhood of $30,000,000 of the public funds on deposit in those banks.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, simply for my own information? Has the gentleman any figures to enable him to state the amount of deposits in national banks, in State banks, in private banks, and in trust companies, say, on the 1st of October last?

Mr. PRINCE. I do not think I have it here at present.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was trying to get that information, and I did not know but the gentleman might have it.

Mr. PRINCE. I may have it, but I do not now recall it.

Mr. HARDY. About $18,000,000,000.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Has the gentleman given consideration to all phases of the subject of the "equitable distribution" of deposits? Of course the gentleman does not want to be unjust to the Secretary of the Treasury. What is an equitable distribution? Does it mean that you shall take out of the commercial assets or funds of the city of New York, where three-quarters of the duties are paid, a proportionate amount of that money? Does it mean that as fast as the Treasury receives that money it shall distribute it in other parts of the country? Or does "equitably" mean that the money shall be deposited where it is collected or that it is to be deposited regardless of where it is collected, according to population or area or in some other way? I think the gentleman would say that it would be wholly unjust to take the money that is collected in the city of Chicago, for instance, in the way of customs, or in Peoria in internal revenue, and take that money away and distribute it and then compel those persons who are engaged in the transaction of business which requires the use of that money daily to pay for shipping it back again. Has the gentleman taken that into consideration?

Mr. PRINCE. I have meant to show this, that the national banking act, page 58, chapter 11, provides that—

All national banking associations designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be depositaries of public money, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary.

There is not a word as to equitable distribution there. That is what I am contending against.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. There is in the law passed last year.

Mr. PRINCE. Providing for equitable distribution?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. But he observes it in his own way, as he sees fit.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And let me say that there has been a commission appointed by the Treasury Department, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has under consideration the question of what is an "equitable" distribution, and what it means.

Mr. PRINCE. Has that commission come to any conclusion yet?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think they have made any report as yet, but the construction of those words "equitable distribution" is being considered, as to whether it means equitably in accordance with population or equitably on the basis of where it is collected.

Mr. PRINCE. I understand that, and the Fowler bill——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Until a conclusion is reached by that commission it strikes me it is hardly fair to blame the Secretary of the Treasury for depositing the money where it is received.

Mr. PRINCE. Would you stand up and defend the Secretary of the Treasury, or any executive official of any kind, in giving to one bank in the city of New York over $17,000,000 as against the whole great State of Illinois $13,000,000?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That would depend entirely on whether $50,000,000 or $75,000,000 had been collected in the city of New York from internal revenue and customs during the preceding week and a very much less amount had been collected in the State of Illinois, and it would also depend on another feature of the case, and that is whether the Illinois banks were ready to put up the bonds to take the deposits.

Now, the gentleman can take for an example the city of Peoria, which has an extremely large internal-revenue collection. I think it would be found almost impossible for the Peoria banks to secure bonds enough to put up security for all of the deposits of the internal-revenue payments in that city. All of these things must be taken into consideration by the Secretary, and the Secretary has gone to work since the passage of the law of last year and appointed a commission. They have been considering it, and the Comptroller of the Currency, coming from Illinois, is a member of that commission which is to determine what is a proper construction of that word "equitable," and I think the Secretary of the Treasury is entitled to immunity from criticism until that committee reports.

Mr. PRINCE. That might be so if House Document No. 714 did not disclose that in the city of New York on the 31st of December, 1907, there were $87,189,132.87 of the Government money in the different banks, as against $13,000,000 in Illinois. I commend to the committee a careful reading of Document 714, submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury under date of February 27, 1908, to the House. I think you will find a good deal of valuable information in it. You will find that in the District of Columbia, where no business, practically, is done, where apparently there seems to be no reason for any great amount of money, on December 31, 1907, the banks had $4,804,574.73, and that one bank, not distantly related to some I have referred to had $1,652,000 on hand, where there was no business whatever. If that is an equitable distribution, I think it is time that the Secretary of the Treasury and the commission got busy and made a report.

Mr. HAYES rose.

Mr. PRINCE. Now, I want to say this, and then I will yield to the gentleman. The Fowler bill puts it beyond question. That bill provides that it shall not have and keep on deposit in any one national bank an amount of money greater than 50 per cent of the capital thereof deposited in any national depository, and in that way there would be an equitable distribution, because equity means doing justice by forty-six States in the Union instead of doing a little overjustice to one State and the District of Columbia. [Applause.] Now I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HAYES. Does not the gentleman think he has done the Secretary of the Treasury an injustice in this—that it has been the policy of all modern Secretaries of the Treasury, at least since I have known anything about the operations of the United States Treasury, to place money where it was most needed during such times and such disturbances as we had from October to January last? I think possibly the gentleman may have lost sight of the fact that New York City was the place where the greatest need was in the view of the Secretary, and that therefore he sent the largest amount of money to that place.

Mr. PRINCE. Well, let us look at that. That is a very proper suggestion and a question worthy of the consideration of the committee and the country. To the city of New York had gone the money from the different banks throughout the country. It had been sent there for speculative purposes, until there had been piled up in that city about the time of the financial trouble the reserve money of different banks throughout the country. There had been poured into the banks about one hundred millions of Government money. They had a large amount of the reserve money on hand, and there was a call on these institutions to send back into the interior some of the money it needed for current purposes. The truth is that the working balance of the Government at one time was reduced to about two and one-half millions of dollars, and it had been so very generous to others that it was almost in distress itself for means to carry on the business of the country and pay its running expenses. The money was called for, and the banks in New York City refused to send the money, refused to hand back the money that belonged to the people, refused to send it back to the banks that placed it there as a reserve, and refused to send it back to the Government, if the Government saw fit to ask for the money. Instead thereof the banks issued clearing-house certificates and handed these evidences of indebtedness to the people to be used by them as best they could in these times. They held on to the actual cash. What did they do with it?

They either themselves, directly or through their friends, used this actual cash, went into the market and bought the stocks at slaughtered prices. Does anyone deny it? If there is one, let him stand up here. Without a question these banks, holding the money that belonged to others, refusing to give them the money, issuing in place thereof their promise to pay, took the identical money, went out into the street, and bought the stocks at slaughtered prices and made an enormous amount of profit out of it. That was the condition of the country at that time, and in the train of such conduct followed woe, bankruptcy, ruin, suicide, and death, and I do not think the whole train is yet over, so far as the country is concerned.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the New York banks, when they were refusing to pay to their depositors the money of those depositors on their checks, were using that money to speculate with themselves?

Mr. PRINCE. I have not any doubt of it, sir.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is that merely a theory, or is it a fact?

Mr. PRINCE. The gentleman will be kind enough——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I only asked the question because it seems to me that it is the duty of the officers who have charge of those things to proceed against any such banks and take away their charter, if such is the fact.

Mr. PRINCE. If the gentleman will be kind enough to look at these documents I have called attention to, he will see the class of securities and the kind of stuff that many of these banks to which I have referred had their money locked up in at that time and were buying; and from newspaper reports I found that when a resolution of inquiry along that line was offered in another body it was promptly sidetracked, because it would open up and show to this country the condition of affairs. That is the reason why I am one of those who believe it would be proper for this House to have a resolution of inquiry along that line.

I am frank to say that, in my judgment, observing the management of these banks, they have been, some of them, mismanaged, and I am frank to say that the Government inspection, through its bank examiners, is practically the same as worthless, because if there had been a genuine, thorough, and honest examination of banking, no such tale of woe, no such tale of mismanagement would have occurred as has just been chronicled in the courts of the city of Chicago, and a man who is aged and bent would not be to-day heading his way toward prison, for by proper investigation and management he would have been stopped. And I want to say further that the bill that I am seeking to advocate within my time is one that puts a stop to all such things as that and, beyond peradventure, saves the country and the banks and the depositors from any such mismanagement as has taken place in this country.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I have no wish to contest the gentleman's statement that many of these banks were mismanaged, or anything of that kind, but along the line of my former suggestion I want to ask if it is not true that in the city of Chicago there was less trouble during the recent so-called "panic" than in any other great city in the United States?

Mr. PRINCE. I think that is true.

Mr. HAYES. And if that be true, was not the Secretary of the Treasury justified in sending less money there than he sent to places where there was greater need, greater trouble?

Mr. PRINCE. No; I do not think so.

Mr. HAYES. I do.

Mr. PRINCE. Because, speaking for my own country, in the city where I live, a city of 25,000 people, our bankers never put a white flag over the banks. They paid all comers and goers, and if other banks had done likewise the country would have been better off, and instead of these clearing-house certificates, which were nothing more nor less than a red flag to the people, a note of distress—which, in my judgment, ought to be assessed a 10 per cent tax, for they were in the nature of notes, and I commend that suggestion to the Department of Justice, that they proceed along that line—I say in that section of the country because the people and the interior banks relieved them largely from that trouble was one of the reasons that Chicago was able to do what she did. But what can be said for poor Kansas City?

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it not a fact that a single dollar could not be gotten in New York without paying a premium, and that the money was carted into Wall street, and it was there for speculation and disposed of at a premium, and if the country banks got any money at all they had to pay a premium?

Mr. PRINCE. I have so understood. I have understood this, that a bank that had some money on deposit in one of those banks, when it called for $100,000 of its own money, was required to pay a premium of $3,000 in order to get it. I have not a doubt of that in my own mind; but if the gentleman were to ask me for proof, perhaps I could not give the specific instance.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have positive knowledge of the fact. I know they charged as much as 4½ per cent premium, and if you were to get the money at all you would have to pay from 3 to 4½ per cent premium. They paid but a small per cent of the amount called for.

Mr. PRINCE. Does the gentleman mean to say that a bank or individual that had money in those banks in calling for his own individual money was required to pay a premium in order to get his own money?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not a premium to the bank. He had to go to the broker, and the supposition is that the broker got the money from the bank.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to say that he has positive knowledge of specific instances where premiums were collected on moneys that were drawn from banks owned by those wishing to withdraw them?

Mr. HAUGEN. I get my information from reliable parties who have large pay rolls, for instance, and had money deposited in the banks. They demanded their money and were unable to get a single dollar of it. In order to get money and in order to pay their men they had to go and pay a premium on the amount of money they needed.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says that he is making the statement from his knowledge of the situation. I do not believe it is fair to make any such statement as that to the country on hearsay.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have stated that the premium was not paid to the bank. It was paid to the brokers, and that was the only place where money could be obtained.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should a broker be able to get money out of the bank when you could not get it yourself?

Mr. HAUGEN. The broker, of course, gets his money from the bank.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PRINCE. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] if he had any experience in banking during this crisis and if he had an account with the New York banks and whether he was permitted or not to draw his money?

Mr. MADDEN. I have had experience with banks in all sections of the country, and I want to say to the gentleman that no person could get all the money that he wanted during the crisis to which he now refers. But I know of no case where any person was obliged to pay any commission whatever for any money that he secured from any bank.

Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa rose.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield further.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Inasmuch as I have refused these gentlemen, I could not yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not want the gentleman to bear too hard on the consciences of some of the banks in New York. Some of them did their duty, and are almost entitled to the credit of being heroes during this panic.

Mr. PRINCE. I spoke of one bank, and then the gentleman forced me to go outside, and then I included the amount that was there on deposit. I have not singled out any bank specially, and do not want to do so. In fact, I do not think it is proper for a gentleman who is entitled to the floor to attack anyone outside that has no means of answering upon the floor. I think it is only parliamentary to attack a Member or someone that has a right to the floor, but it would be almost unpardonable, as I take it, on my part to assault anyone who has not the right of the floor, in order to answer me on the floor, and if I have been drawn into that I am going to modify my speech to that extent.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. May I ask the gentleman to modify it to this extent: To take the document to which he referred a moment ago, and which was lying on the desk in front of him, but which I do not see now, which is the report of the Secretary in regard to the proceedings of the Treasury during the panic, and which shows that at the close of the panic, the banks of New York City, after having taken in $100,000,000 in gold from Europe, and in addition having issued a large amount of circulation, found themselves stripped of all of that and a good deal more, too, because they had sent it out to the country banks. They are entitled to that fair statement, and I ask the gentleman to embody in his remarks the statement taken direct from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury as to just the condition of the New York banks before the panic and the condition they were in afterwards.

Mr. PRINCE. There is no question that they paid some of the money, and it may be along the line as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], that they could get a good round premium when they sent that money out, and quite likely they did, or they would not have done it, perhaps.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield to a banker to ask him a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; if the gentleman will give me longer time.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the gentleman know on what basis of value or security a clearing-house certificate is granted?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes. The different banks that enter into the clearing-house district are required to furnish ample security before certificates are issued to them.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does not the gentleman know that that is the best security that is obtainable for a loan?

Mr. PRINCE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. McMILLAN. Why, then, would you object to the United States taking that in lieu of its loan when it is really the representation of the bone and sinew in the construction of our country? I am connected with four banks. I have paid out the largest pay roll in the last three months of any man on this floor, and I have never had to pay one cent of shave for the money whereby to pay my men, and everything I am connected with has paid every just demand for labor. If a man wanted to go to Wall street he could not get a dollar.

Mr. PRINCE. I am willing to answer questions, but I can not have the gentleman inject a speech into my remarks. There is no question but that the gentleman is correct in his statement that the basis on which clearing-house certificates are issued is of the very best kind. And along that same line comes the theory of the credit currency, that the commercial credit of the country is of the very best kind, and this only tends to prove the position we take in favor of a credit currency, only demonstrating beyond the possibility of a doubt that it is the best basis for the credit currency.

We know that the chairman of the committee [Mr. FOWLER], in season and out of season, for years and years, has been contending that this basis for clearing-house issues would be a good basis for credit currency, not asset currency, that had near by the touchstone of redemption which he provides for in his measure.

There are two schools of finance, as we observe it, in the bills that have been presented in this House and Congress. One honestly, intelligently, and patriotically—I am not criticising them for this—for a bond-based currency; the other does not believe in a bond-based currency. The people are divided upon that question; financiers are divided; we are in doubt upon that question. Is there any way that we can settle it? Is there anything to turn to to determine our policy? Take the history of the commercial countries of the world. Take the fact that the first-class commercial countries to-day on the globe outside of the United States have a credit currency. Is it not notice enough that there is something solid in the position that these countries take, and is it not ground, at least, of admonition to some people that there is some reason, some basis for the credit currency that is being advocated by the advocates of the Fowler measure? On one side stands part of the people of the United States; on the other side stands part of the people of the United States and all the balance of the commercial world. Where is the heavy artillery, where the strength of the business interests of the world, where the financial knowledge of men who are dealing with this question? Is it for bond issue and bond currency, or is it for credit currency with which the commercial countries agree?

Let us follow this bond-based currency a while. When did it start? Did we have it prior to the war? Partly, and partly not. That which we have that was bond based, the notes failed. That which was based upon the credit currency, like the Suffolk Bank system in New England, like the great Bank of Louisiana, never failed, but met their notes; and long after the war, when property was destroyed, when the bonds of the Confederacy went to pieces, when its government notes went to pieces, the State Bank of Louisiana, that had issued its notes, paid every one of them 100 cents on the dollar. Is that knowledge enough to cause people to open their eyes as to what are the facts of history of this country and the commercial countries of the world?

We went upon bond-based currency in stress of war, which currency during the war was worth but very little on the dollar.

We have pending in this House, and I read by the papers there is pending elsewhere, a bill to enlarge the bond-secured currency. The purpose of that bill is to add to the United States Government bonds State bonds, city bonds, municipal bonds, and bonds that are created by districts, like the drainage district, if you please, of the city of Chicago; like drainage districts throughout the country, or sanitary districts or any kind of a public district that is acting as a sovereign power and had given to it the right to issue bonds. That is to be the basis, with proper limitations, upon which to issue currency with a tax upon it. They say that currency based upon these bonds are of stable value and will be universally accepted, because there is something back of them, a bond which means something. Of these men I am not here to complain to any great extent. I do not think it is based upon the proper basis for a currency that will expand and enlarge and recede as business demands. I further notice that many of these bonds go down in value. I also notice in addition to that there has come to be a new school of financiers, who believe that these bonds should be added to. They say that if the whole sovereign power issues a bond and that is good as a basis of currency, that an integral part of the sovereign power when it issues a bond, it ought to be good enough to be used as a basis of currency when it meets the requirements of the law.

So that when you resolve it down to a bond that is issued by the sovereign power of the people, either an integral part of the whole or the whole, there may be some good reason for that kind of security. We meet with another school that goes this school a little better and wants to add to these sovereign bonds issued by the sovereign power, having the whole country back of it, having the taxing power of the people back of it, either the whole or an integral part, railroad bonds and interurban bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say for the information of the gentleman that the bill has been amended by striking out railroad bonds.

Mr. PRINCE. When has it been amended?

Mr. MADDEN. To-day.

Mr. PRINCE. I have just been informed by my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], one of the ablest and best men in the House, that that against which I am now contending has gone out of the bill, showing that if that action has been taken, they have acted wisely in that regard, at least to that extent.

Mr. MADDEN. To a slight degree.

Mr. PRINCE. To a slight degree; and yet they are moving along sane lines in taking out bonds which, during the panic we have been passing through, were reduced in value from 10 to 50 points from August up to the 1st of January of this year. I am glad to say that they have gone out, and I am inclined to think that more things will go out before the bill receives the signature of the President of the United States.

Mr. ADAIR. I should like to ask the gentleman, if it is true that these bonds have gone out, is it not a fact that all of the bill has gone out, because there will not be a sufficient amount of other bonds to put up as security for the amount of currency to be issued?

Mr. PRINCE. I am very glad the gentleman asked me that question. I was coming to that in the discussion. I have been sitting for two or three years at the feet of the financial Gamaliel of this House, my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER], have been reading much and have heard much from him. And in the course of the discussion and in the course of the reading I have wondered why it was that these latter bonds, which, according to rumor, have gone out of the Senate bill, were ever even considered as worthy of being a part of a financial measure. I read and studied, and finally found a distinguished statesman who had given utterance to this expression, that these bonds were included because the Secretary of the Treasury, under the law, had a right to use them for the purpose of securing the deposits of public money. Let us see what that is. On page 59 of the law I read this:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall require the association thus designated, being a depository, to give satisfactory security by the deposit of United States bonds and otherwise for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the money deposited.

Mr. ADAIR. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if the Secretary of the Treasury has not been striking out the word "and" and inserting the word "or?"

Mr. PRINCE. As to that, Mr. Chairman, I do not know by what authority the Secretary of the Treasury or any other executive officer has the right to change any law enacted by Congress and signed by the Executive. I think it is high time that the law be obeyed by everybody and not changed by anybody.

Mr. ADAIR. I mean has he not in fact done it without asking any authority?

Mr. PRINCE. That is a question that the gentleman can answer as well as I can. The theory upon which bonds of this kind were accepted was that the law permitted it under the words "United States bonds and otherwise." I have not looked closely, so therefore I would not dare say. It may be that he would accept one Government bond for a hundred dollars and the balance in chips and whetstones to come under the words "and otherwise." I do not suppose he would dare go to the extent of having no United States bonds, and accept nothing but chips and whetstones and all kinds of other things, as you will see they have been accepting as security, if you will look at the report, to which I have heretofore referred.

They may be ample, they may be secure, but I am calling the attention of the House for the purpose of showing that one statesman expressed the views that that was the justification, or at least the semblance of justification, for including that kind of bond as a basis for circulation.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINCE. I will.

Mr. HINSHAW. As I understand it, and I will ask the gentleman if it is true, the chief difference between the bond-secured proposition and the Fowler bill is that in the bond-secured proposition these various kinds of bonds may be put up for the issuance of currency, whereas in the Fowler proposition there is no security whatever except the reserve fund in gold. What other difference is there, if the gentleman will state?

Mr. PRINCE. I am coming to that. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed along the line I am now on, I will answer him, and if I do not the gentleman can remind me of it before I close. I further read where another statesman has said—

That there were not enough State, county, town and other municipal bonds in sufficient number and amount to afford a basis for the superstructure such as was needed for the issuance of five hundred million additional emergency currency.

That, in substance, is the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR]. It was feared that if the additional emergency currency was limited to this class of bonds that a corner could be engineered upon them to the detriment of the country. I was inclined to believe there was great force in the argument. I read on, and later I found it stated by this same statesman "that there were over two thousand million dollars of these kinds of bonds now in existence that could be used for the purpose of issuing additional currency."

After reading this last statement I was clearly convinced that there was no shadow of reason—mark what I say—no shadow of reason why railroad bonds or street-car bonds should be had as a basis for currency. I am inclined to think that these last-mentioned bonds should have no place as a basis for currency, and the purpose of their being included is for some purpose other than being needed as a basis for currency circulation. I have wondered if there were not a little curly-headed fellow in the woodpile and if he were there for speculative purposes.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman give the name of this statesman?

Mr. PRINCE. I can not give the gentleman's name, but he says there were not enough of the bonds, and further on in the article he said there were two thousand million of these bonds, ample to base currency upon.

Now, this statesman was a gentleman familiar with the bill, and these are excerpts from remarks made elsewhere. I am speaking of what was in the newspaper. This gentleman, a member of the committee who framed the bill, gave as a reason that there were not enough of the bonds, and then stated that there were two thousand million dollars of them that could be used under the provisions of the bill. Now, if two thousand millions could be used under the provisions of the bill, will you tell me how many thousand millions could be used as the country develops, as towns and districts are growing, and as additional bonds would be issued from time to time to meet the current expenses and indebtedness of the country?

Now, I seem to be arguing and discussing a horse that is dead and gone. I congratulate the country that it has been stricken from the measure and that the country will now be presented with a different proposition; but to that amended proposition I am not much more favorably inclined than I was to it along the line it was first presented, except that one of the worst features has gone out of the bill as reported by my colleague.

What is the other currency feature? It is that which is advocated by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER], and I name him because the bill is known by his name, and what, in substance, is it? He believes not in asset currency, but he believes in a credit currency. He believes that a bank should be permitted to issue currency upon the credits in a bank—a book credit, if you please, deposits—and when a person asks for money or credits or currency, that he can have either that he sees fit, and when the bank issues its currency notes, they go out into circulation. Now comes the question of the gentleman from Nebraska——

Mr. HINSHAW. I am not in favor of the so-called "Aldrich bill" as at present constructed. I do not want the inference to be drawn that I am. But outside of the assets of the bank proper, the assets the bank has within its vaults, what other security is there for the issuance of currency under the Fowler bill than the gold reserve?

Mr. PRINCE. That is right. That is a good proposition. That is a fair question. The gentleman asks me this. He says, under the bond-secured currency, before currency can issue a bond must be purchased or borrowed by the bank that seeks to issue the currency, and that bond, either purchased or borrowed, must be taken by the bank that wants the currency and given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury holds in the vault the bonds, and he hands out the currency, and the currency in circulation is secured by the bond that is held by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, you ask me what are the provisions of the Fowler bill on this question. The Fowler bill issues currency, and the gentleman asks me if there is any security placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I answer you, "No." Then you say, "Will the holder of that kind of a note that has no security in the hands of the Government find that it is as good in his hands as that which is based on a bond which the Government holds to secure the note in hand?" I say, "Yes; it is just as good."

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And better.

Mr. PRINCE. And better. You ask how that apparent paradoxical statement is true. Let me answer. The Fowler bill permits the bank to issue, under certain conditions, a note. That note is handed to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW]. That note in the hands of the gentleman from Nebraska calls for gold or lawful money. He can turn around a minute after he gets it and go to Mr. FOWLER, whose bank issued it, and say, "Give me gold for that note," and Mr. FOWLER hands it out. He can call for lawful money. Mr. FOWLER hands it out. Mr. FOWLER has made provision in that bill that the country of the United States shall be divided into twenty zones or territories, for the purpose of the convenience of redemption, and that there shall be a city within each one of those zones, where every bank that does business within that zone has money on hand to redeem its note in gold or lawful money. Mr. FOWLER, when he starts that kind of a bank, must keep within his own bank gold or lawful money to meet his issued note, which you have, or he has to have money in the bank where Mr. SPERRY is president, which is the redemption bank—he has to keep money there, either gold or lawful money; so that if the note that you present gets into the bank of Mr. SPERRY, he will redeem it in gold or lawful money. Now, what is lawful money? Not national-bank notes, not this kind of notes, not gold certificates or silver certificates in the sense of law, but gold or silver or United States notes. The bond-secured currency has to be redeemed. The redeemer of bond-secured currency is the Government of the United States. You can take your national-bank note and exchange it for lawful money. You can take that lawful money to the Treasury of the United States and demand gold. You have a way to start the endless chain and bring the gold out of the Treasury to redeem your notes, and to-day there is placed upon the Government of the United States the burden of redeeming all greenbacks, of redeeming the silver and keeping it at a parity with gold, of redeeming the Treasury notes, of redeeming the United States notes, the greenbacks, of redeeming the present volume of 695,000,000 of national-bank notes; and if 500,000,000, or a billion more are issued by this so-called "emergency bill," you pile a billion more upon the gold that the Government has to maintain, and you start to running the endless chain that will force this Government to sell bonds in time of peace to keep our money at a parity.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Let me finish this. Does the Government agree to redeem the notes in the Fowler bill? No. Is there any further security? Yes. Five per cent of the deposits in his bank, taking the preceding six months—5 per cent of the circulation of all banks, of all the national banks, of the deposits in all the national banks—5 per cent of the deposits, 5 per cent of the notes, and 2 per cent of a tax while these notes are in circulation is placed in a fund to guarantee the prompt redemption of the notes so issued.

The burden of keeping the gold for redeeming the notes is upon Mr. FOWLER, not upon the Government. What would be the effect of his bill if it went into operation? There would be just two kinds of money and currency. The Government would go back to its original position and coin money and regulate the value thereof. It would have specie as money. The bank would then issue through banking operations the currency that would meet the demands of the people, and when the time came for the demand to cease the notes would go back into banks and cease to be in circulation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. PRINCE. The 5 per cent on the deposit notes, the 5 per cent on the notes, and the tax on the notes added together the first year would bring in $25,000,000. It is pretty hard to keep all of these figures in my head.

You ask if that is ample to redeem notes and pay depositors. That is a guaranty fund for the payment of the notes, for the payment of the depositors. The depositors are of three kinds: First, the individual depositor; second, the bank that deposits, and third, the Government deposits. Now, is this ample to meet all the requirements? It looks like a pretty large sum. How much is there? There might possibly be issued a billion dollars of this kind of circulation. The deposits in the savings banks, State banks, and national banks all together would be thirteen billion. There is fourteen billion. Would that be ample, asks the "Doubting Thomas?" Would that fund be ample to meet this great demand? Would 5 per cent be ample to meet it? The fund would eventually amount to about seven hundred million. The only way I can answer that is by showing what is the fact, what is the history of our country upon that question.

Let us go to 1873. I do not want to take the good years. I want to take the worst years this country has had, and that is the way to prove the case. If you can not prove it by the worst years, you ought not to try to prove it by the best years. Here is the report of the Comptroller of the Currency as to the losses of depositors in national banks, beginning with the year 1865 and ending with the year 1905. Let us take the panic of 1873. There were eleven banks that failed. For all the deposits of every kind and character, including individual deposits, including Government deposits, a tax of two-tenths or a trifle over two-tenths of 1 per cent on all the deposits would have met all the losses. And yet the Fowler bill provides a tax of 5 per cent. A tax of two-tenths of 1 per cent would have met all the losses of all the depositors of every kind and character, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, in the bad year of 1873, when eleven banks failed. Is that a sufficient answer that the fund is large enough? Let us go a little further. Let us take another year that is even worse than that, if you please. Let us take the year of 1893. There were fifty-one bank failures in that year. A tax of twenty-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent on all the deposits in all the banks would have paid all the losses of all depositors, including Government deposits, for the year 1893, the worst year this country has had so far as bank failures are concerned, since 1865. The panic of this year does not at all compare with it. Very few banks failed during this panic.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is there any limit in the plan the gentleman favors on the amount of notes that the bank may issue?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What is that limitation?

Mr. PRINCE. To its paid-up capital, and then if the board of managers in the zone see fit, and there is necessity for it, they can increase it, say, 100 per cent.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is it taxed?

Mr. PRINCE. It is taxed; and a deposit has to be put up against it.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. That is a guaranty fund, but not an emergency tax.

Mr. PRINCE. There is a reserve against it. We do not claim it is an emergency currency at all. I am frank to say to the gentleman that the moment the Congress of the United States proceeds to deliberately pass a bill that indicates its currency is not sound, that it has to have an emergency currency, it hoists a red flag over the Capitol and gives notice to the whole world that we can not depend upon our currency, that it is unsound somewhere, and we must have an emergency currency.

Is it not a very fine thing for the United States to put over the Capitol the red flag of distress when there is no need for it? I want to say, gentlemen, that there is ample money and currency to do the business of the country. There are $35.54 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, every dollar of which is worth 100 cents—twice as much as we had when we had greenbackism so rampant in our country.

Mr. PUJO. I understand the gentleman from Illinois advocates that feature of the bill guaranteeing deposits?

Mr. PRINCE. I do, sir.

Mr. PUJO. I understand that the deposits in all the banks, national, State, and savings banks, approximate thirteen billions, do they not?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUJO. And the money will approximate something like three billions?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUJO. Then you would have $10,000,000,000 on which to guarantee deposits that is nothing except a book credit guaranteed in the banks of this country?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; I would have the deposits guaranteed.

Mr. PUJO. Is that a guaranty of deposits or a guaranty of ten-thirteenths of the credit represented by giving to some one credit in the bank of an amount for which he has made his note?

Mr. PRINCE. The chances are the bookkeeping would have to be readjusted so as to show the actual deposit, instead of having a lot of paper credit.

Mr. PUJO. Is not your argument in favor of guaranteeing the deposits in its last analysis that the Government of the United States supervises the bank, so that the depositors are given some measure of protection, because the inspectors go over the books, and that holds out under the law the safety of the depositors and those who do business with the national banks? Would not the same reason apply to one who would invest in a railroad bond, that his investment should likewise be protected?

Mr. PRINCE. I think not.

Mr. PUJO. Do we not regulate railways? Have we not an Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. PRINCE. I have answered you frankly; I answered that I am in favor of guaranteeing the deposits. That ought to be sufficient. Then let me go on and sustain my position.

Mr. PUJO. One more question.

Mr. PRINCE. Please let me go on.

Mr. PUJO. In support of another feature.

Mr. PRINCE. I must decline, because I have answered your question frankly. I do not believe in dodging any question. Now, on the question of deposits, let us see what shape we are in. Here are banks in the State of Illinois, a State bank on one corner and on the other corner is a national bank. When a man takes his money and puts it in the national bank, if he deposits $100 in the bank the banker is required to keep $15 reserve against that $100. If his neighbor takes $100 and puts it in a State bank of the State of Illinois the banker does not have to keep a penny as a reserve on that $100 deposit.

Mr. MADDEN. Is my colleague quite sure about that?

Mr. PRINCE. I am quite sure, because a recent statement of the Comptroller of the Currency said that up to January 1, 1908, that was the law in Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The State banks do keep 25 per cent reserve, as a matter of fact.

Mr. PRINCE. As a matter of fact, they may do one thing, but as a matter of law they are not required to do it. And this is what you have. You will have the strong national or State bank holding up the weak State bank. Let me say to you that the first bank to put the white flag of surrender over its building was not a national bank.

Talk about your depositors, what security have they now? You take the State banks of Illinois, the third State in the Union, having within its limits the second city. Have those State banks a legal reserve? Not a penny have they to keep as reserve for any hundred dollars that may be deposited. The people of the country do not distinguish between a State and a national bank, and if there is a run on one of these banks and it fails, there is going to be a run on the other banks; and it is the strong national and State bank that has to come to the support of the weak State bank. It is the strong banks of the country that sustain the weaker banks. The strength of your chain is the weakest link in the chain. The State banking institutions are not required to keep a penny of reserve.

Mr. COLE. Has there been any experience in the history of any of the States on the subject of insuring deposits, levying a tax for that purpose?

Mr. PRINCE. As to that I can not answer.

Mr. COLE. And if so, has it been successful?

Mr. PRINCE. I am unable to answer that; but let me read this:

Reserves of banks and trust companies required by the laws of the different States down to January 1, 1908:
Illinois, no reserve requirement.

That ought to be clear enough.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does not the gentleman know it to be a fact that the strongest bank in the world, the Bank of France, has no reserve requirement, but that it keeps the largest reserve of any bank in the world?

Mr. PRINCE. That is a central bank, and they operate in a different way than our State banks. Let us confine ourselves to the question at issue. I am talking about the banks of this country. There is a report here and a criticism of this bill by a gentleman, who, in my judgment, is the equal of any gentleman who sits on the floor of this House, and who has no superior in either branch of Congress, a man who has given you in his minority views the most succinct, the most telling, the strongest reasons that can be urged against the Fowler bill. I refer to my distinguished colleague and friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and I commend his report to your reading. Now, what does he say on page 3, as to this question of a currency:

It may be conceded that this is the most correct principle for the issuance of currency.

What does he say on page 5:

Again, it should be noted that this measure does not contemplate the guaranty of deposits in savings banks, where the depositor is most liable to imposition, and where his loss would be most severely felt.

Have I put it too strongly myself? If I have, I am buttressed by a gentleman in whose judgment I have great confidence, and whose judgment is correct so far as that statement is concerned.

And let me go a little further. I read in the public press that one of the ablest and most erudite members of another body said that if we were to change our currency and were to start anew, most assuredly, to use his expression, the kind of currency we now have is the worst kind we could have.

Mr. VREELAND. I assume that the gentleman from Illinois favors the passage of the Fowler bill.

Mr. PRINCE. I do.

Mr. VREELAND. I assume from his argument that he thinks that State banks and savings banks and trust companies should be required by law to maintain an adequate reserve.

Mr. PRINCE. I do.

Mr. VREELAND. Will the gentleman explain to the committee how the Fowler bill will compel the maintaining of proper reserves by these classes of banks?

Mr. PRINCE. As to that, I can only say that, in my judgment, if the Fowler bill becomes a law, if the deposits of the depositor are guaranteed by these banks, as there is an ample fund to do, the chances are ninety-nine out of a hundred that the men who have money to deposit will deposit it in places where they know it is absolutely safe and where they can get it, rather than take any chances in putting it where they may or may not get it when they call for it; and I am inclined to think, and it is the theory of the bill, that these other banks in time will come under this system, and we will have one uniform general system, which will be under supervision and control and which will be managed in a way that no losses can occur to a depositor, a note holder, or anyone interested therein.

Mr. VREELAND. There are some 600 savings banks in New York and New England that are purely mutual, in which there is no stock, and it is evident that it would be impossible for them to turn into the national system. Will the gentleman explain what would become of those banks, with their two and a half billions of deposits and their two and a half millions of depositors?

Mr. PRINCE. So far as that is concerned, we have nothing to do with the savings banks in this bill. Those are excepted and are no part of this measure. I am inclined to think that if it should turn out that it is better to keep them, they will remain.

Conditions will open up to show the way just as it has in all conditions of that kind. If they are perfectly safe, I should say by all means continue where they are.

Mr. VREELAND. Will the gentleman tell us if the system of guaranteed deposits by the Government—I understand it is not in terms a guaranteeing of deposits, but it practically amounts to that, compelling the banks to pay a certain sum to guarantee the depositors—if that system should prove to be what the author of the bill hopes it will be, could the great savings banks of the East, which are mutual in their form, live side by side with the banks whose deposits are guaranteed by the Government?

Mr. PRINCE. I wish to say that there is not a word, a syllable, or a line in this bill which places the burden of guaranteeing a penny upon the Government.

Mr. VREELAND. I just stated to the gentleman not in terms.

Mr. PRINCE. Then let us leave out the question of Government guaranteeing deposits.

Mr. VREELAND. Well, put it that the funds required by the Government to be deposited, and we still have the question under the system of guaranteeing deposits, Can the mutual savings banks which exist in such great number, having deposits running up into the millions, exist side by side with the banks whose deposits are guaranteed?

Mr. PRINCE. If it is in the interest of the depositor and for his safety to have his money placed in the national banks rather than in the other banks, would the gentleman from New York insist that he should not have his interests conserved?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am just as much opposed to guaranteeing deposits as is the gentleman from New York, but let us be fair. There is no relation between the bill which the gentleman has reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency and the mutual savings banks. My State has one hundred and eighty-five millions of deposits in the mutual savings banks, but the State steps in and says what kind of investments shall be made. They are not doing a commercial business like the banks to which the gentleman refers and to which the bill relates. It is entirely an independent proposition, and the gentlemen ought to except them, as the bill does except them. Why mix them up; let us meet the question fairly and squarely. It does not do any good to compare them to the savings banks, because it does not relate to them.

Mr. PRINCE. Let us not try to muddle the water; let us not try to play the cuttlefish and ink the waters to escape the issue. Let us meet the issue. I state frankly that I am for the measure. I believe it is the best measure of any proposed, and that it will work to the interest of the country better than any other. It will meet the desires of the people, and the deposits of the people are safe under this system. I know currency will enlarge and expand and recede as the business interests demand. I know that the burden of maintaining and keeping that currency at a parity with gold will be placed upon the banks and not upon the Government; and I know that by no possibility under the Fowler bill can the endless chain be operated as it was under the Administration of President Cleveland, forcing this country in a time of peace to issue bonds to maintain a gold reserve.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us how the banks are going to get the gold to maintain the notes at a parity with gold?

Mr. PRINCE. It is easy enough to get it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us how?

Mr. PRINCE. There is plenty of gold. Let me say to my colleague that the annual output from the mines of the world is $400,000,000. Seventy-five million dollars is used other than for coinage, and three hundred and twenty-five millions is added annually to the money coinage of the world. And let me say to the gentleman what occurs here in our own country. I have just received this from the Director of the Mint. The net excess of imports of gold over exports was $114,334,643 for eight months last past.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PRINCE. In just a moment. I remember in the discussion of the money question in 1896 that we all thought if we could add to the currency of the country, to the gold, about fifty or sixty million dollars, it was ample to meet the needs of the country, and yet during eight months of this last year, a part of which was a panic time, there was added to the volume of the currency, gold, not silver—I can give you the silver also for the same time; the net of silver excess of imports over exports was fourteen million, and of gold one hundred and fourteen million——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PRINCE. I will be glad to answer it if the gentleman will give me more time. Can he not give me just three minutes?

Mr. KEIFER. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. HARDY. Is not every central banking system known to civilization, where there is a central bank with branch banks under it, a system of mutual guaranty of deposits in another form?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, in effect; and what we want to do—and I am glad the gentleman has brought that to my attention, for I have been deflected from the course of my remarks. Here are 6,000 and upward of individual banks, and they will be combined in these zones. They will have a voice in the selection of the managers, and these managers will be in charge of these zones. These will coordinate, these banks, in twenty places. The banks in this zone will be under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency, and in these respective districts there is coordination of the various banks, and they stand united as one central bank, and yet each one of them is an entity, each one of them has an individual standing by itself, maintaining its individuality and its individual strength, but coordinated as one for the benefit of the whole country. And that is one of the best features of the bill, and I earnestly ask the committee to read this bill. I ask you to read the report, I ask you to read the minority views and their report, and I ask you to read the views of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. Do not be carried off your feet by the wishes of anybody. Read these measures, and if they can not stand the test, do not vote for them. I say to you, if you will read them and study them, you will be convinced that this bill—the Fowler bill—is the correct principle; you will be convinced it is the one that you should vote for, and I would not be surprised in the slightest degree, if this House will read the measure, that they will stand for this bill so far as this House is concerned.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. The gentleman tells us that if this bill passes it will make it impossible to issue bonds like Cleveland did. Cleveland issued bonds to get money in a depleted Treasury. Please inform the House what effect it will have upon the issuance of bonds like those issued under this Administration, to get money in the Treasury, when we had $250,000,000 already there.

Mr. PRINCE. As to that I will say this: We had two hundred and forty millions—anyway, we had over two hundred millions—at the time that the Secretary, in his judgment, acting in good faith—no criticism of him in the slightest degree—thought it was wise to throw into the maelstrom in New York City an amount of money and stop, if he could, what appeared to be a panic, and I want to say that in those days he added $40,000,000 to the bonded indebtedness of the United States between August 1 and January 1, 1908.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Why did not he go out and buy bonds instead of selling them? He had money enough to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOWERS. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of the United Hatters of North America is of far-reaching importance and affects every workingman in our country. That decision practically holds that a labor organization is a trust and subject to the provisions of the so-called "antitrust law." I do not think this was the intention of Congress when the act was passed; but be that as it may my judgment is that this decision should be given the widest possible publicity, with the comments of the leaders of organized labor, to the end that all may know. So, Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time a very able and exhaustive and lucid commentary on the decision by President Samuel Gompers, an editorial by him in the American Federationist, and the decision itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Editorial from American Federationist, by Samuel Gompers.]

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS MUST NOT BE OUTLAWED—THE SUPREME COURT'S DECISION IN THE HATTERS' CASE.

On February 3, 1908, the Supreme Court issued the most drastic and far-reaching decision which it has ever handed down. This decision directly affects all labor, and hence the whole people. The case was that of the Loewe Company against The United Hatters of North America. The court invokes the Sherman antitrust law and under it decides that the Hatters are liable in damages according to the complaint of the Loewe Company. This action was first brought in the United States circuit court in the district of Connecticut under section 7 of the Sherman antitrust law. The lower court sustained the contention of the Hatters that they were not liable under the Sherman law.

The Loewe Company then carried the case by writ of error to the circuit court of appeals. The circuit court, desiring the instruction of the Supreme Court on the writ of error, put the question thus:

"Upon this state of facts can the plaintiffs (Loewe & Co.)[a] maintain an action against the defendants (Hatters) under section 7 of the Sherman antitrust law of July 2, 1890?"

The plaintiffs and defendants then joined in the application to the Supreme Court to require the whole record and cause to be sent up for its consideration. This application was granted.

The Supreme Court invoked not only section 7, but sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman antitrust act, and declared that: "In our opinion the combination described in the declaration (United Hatters) was a combination in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States in the sense in which those words are used in the act, and the action can be maintained accordingly."

The decree also states:

"And that conclusion rests on many judgments of this court to the effect that the act (Sherman antitrust) prohibits any combination whatever to secure action which essentially obstructs the free flow of commerce between the States, or restricts in that regard the liberty of a trader to engage in business.

"The combination charged (boycott by Hatters) falls within the class of restraints of trade aimed at compelling third parties and strangers involuntarily not to engage in the course of trade except on conditions that the combination (Hatters) imposes."

The sections of the Sherman antitrust law upon which the decision is based are as follows:

"SECTION 1. Every contract, combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments in the discretion of the court."

"SEC. 7. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

in full. The court attached the complaint of the plaintiffs in the margin of the decision, and it also quotes from their complaint in the body of the decision.

No more sweeping, far-reaching, and important decision has ever been issued by the Supreme Court. The Dred Scott decision did not approach this in scope and importance, for it only decreed that any runaway slave could be pursued if he made his escape into a free State and his return compelled by all the powers of the Government, to his owner to a slave State. Any person who assisted in the escape of a slave or who harbored him could be prosecuted before the courts for a criminal offense. That decision involved the few negro slaves who could make good their escape from a slave-holding State. The civil war annulled the decision of the Supreme Court and freed the slaves. It cost the lives of hundreds of thousands of brave men on both sides and emancipated from chattel slavery 4,000,000 slaves. No man now proudly points to that famous Dred Scott Supreme Court decision.

The decision of the Supreme Court in the Hatters' case involves every worker and every sympathizer with the ennobling work of the labor movement of our land. A study of this momentous decision reveals some strange peculiarities. Outside of the opening paragraphs quoted above, the decision has very little other than the citation of cases which are held to illustrate and support it. There are references to injunctions granted under the Sherman Antitrust Act and brief comment upon the citations, the decision gives an outline of the complaint incorrect in many particulars, especially in its summary of boycott proceedings by the Hatters. It quotes directly and at great length from the complaint (Loewe & Co.). The decision concludes thus:

"And then follows the averments (in Loewe complaint) that the defendants (Hatters) proceeded to carry out their combination to restrain and destroy interstate trade and commerce between the plaintiffs and their customers in other States by employing the identical means contrived for that purpose, and that by reason of those acts plaintiffs were damaged in their business and property in some $80,000.

"We think a case within the statute was set up and that the demurrer should have been overruled.

"Judgment (of lower court) reversed, and cause remanded with a direction to proceed accordingly."

Reference to the decision itself will show what precedents are quoted and what comments the court makes on them to show their alleged bearing on this case; but, in truth, not one of them in any degree parallels this case or sets any precedent that the layman can discover.

The Hatters' defense of the boycott, their explanation, and justification—for the boycott is admitted—appears nowhere in the decision.

As the complaint of the plaintiffs (the Loewe Company) is published in full with decision, it would seem only fair that the reply of the defendants (Hatters) should also have been reproduced.

As it is, the complaint of the plaintiffs is apparently taken by the court as a true and correct account of what happened, though it is in reality full of the most glaring inaccuracies and misstatements. We have not the space here to quote the complaint and point out its fallacies, but may do so in the future.

When the court quotes from the complaint it includes its errors.

Some of these we shall point out, for it is not right that what is destined to become so historic a decision should rest upon a faulty foundation of fact without protest.

The court, quoting from the plaintiff's complaint, directly, says that defendants were—

"engaged in a combined scheme and effort to force all manufacturers of fur hats in the United States, including the plaintiffs, against their will and their previous policy of carrying on their business, to organize their workmen in the departments of making and finishing in each of their factories into an organization, to be part and parcel of the said combination known as the United Hatters of North America, or as the defendants and their confederates term it, unionize their shops, with the intent thereby to control the employment of labor in and the operation of said factories, and to subject the same to the direction and control of persons other than the owners of the same, in a manner extremely onerous and distasteful to such owners, and to carry out such scheme, effort, and purpose, by restraining and destroying the interstate trade and commerce of such manufacturers, by means of intimidation of and threats made to such manufacturers and their customers in the several States, of boycotting them, their product, and their customers, using therefor all the powerful means at their command as aforesaid until such time as, from the damage and loss of business resulting therefrom, the said manufacturers should yield to the said demand to unionize their factories."

The Hatters had union agreements with seventy out of eighty-two manufacturers in the country. The Supreme Court says of this:

"That the conspiracy or combination was so far progressed that out of eighty-two manufacturers of this country engaged in the production of fur hats, seventy had accepted the terms and acceded to the demand that the shop should be conducted in accordance, so far as conditions of employment were concerned, with the will of the American Federation of Labor; that the local union demanded of plaintiffs that they should unionize their shop under the peril of being boycotted by this combination, which demand defendants declined to comply with; that thereupon the American Federation of Labor, acting through its official organ and through its organizers, declared a boycott.

The court takes the amazing view that even the very successful effort of the hatters' union to obtain and maintain industrial peace with employers is proof of unlawful conduct—that is, "conspiracy"—and under the Sherman antitrust law unlawful and punishable by being mulcted in damages and by fine and imprisonment.

As a matter of fact, neither the hatters nor any other trade ever attempted to "force all manufacturers against their will" to make agreements with the union. Common sense teaches that a voluntary agreement between an employer and a union must be a peaceful one.

All union agreements with employers are voluntary and mutual.

No union could, if it tried, force an employer to enter into an agreement with it. No union attempts such unbusinesslike tactics. The most any union has done is to decline to buy the products of a firm which declined to employ union men and grant the prevailing rate of wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment. Supposing that they were exercising their constitutional right of free speech, union men have asked their friends and fellow-unionists not to buy such goods. A word as to this custom may not be amiss here.

No manufacturer, no retailer, has any vested right in the purchasing power of an individual or of the community; no court can confer upon him that right. The patronage or purchasing of goods depends on the whim of those who buy. A purchaser may decline to buy certain goods, for the most absurd reason or no reason; yet the person who has those goods to sell has no resource by which he can force the purchaser to buy them.

In illustration of this, witness the stock of goods which accumulate in every line of retail business, nothing wrong with the goods except that the whim of a passing fashion has decreed them out of date and the purchaser looks for novelty, or, on the other hand, the purchaser may decline to buy the article in fashion and insist upon the indulgence of individual taste, thus greatly disappointing the retailer who would like to dispose of stock on hand. We digress this much to show how completely the purchasing power is vested in inclination.

In the case in point the boycott by the hatters against the Loewe Company did not result in fewer hats being purchased by the community; therefore we can not see how there was any retraint of trade. The boycott, if effective, merely diverted the purchasers to some other make of hats. The volume of trade was the same, though for certain reasons some manufacturers may have sold more hats than others. We fail to see that the hatters did anything more than ordinary business competitors do when they try to divert business to themselves from other competitors by advertising. The hatters tried to divert the hat business to the products of union labor. Since their boycott neither obstructed nor decreased the total volume of trade, we fail to see how their action could be "a conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce."

The Supreme Court in its decision specifically charges that the American Federation of Labor acting through its official organ and through its organizers declared a boycott.

THE COURT'S ERROR IN FACT.

The court is in error. The American Federation of Labor never indorsed or declared a boycott against the Loewe Company. In fact, no request for such action in any manner or form was ever made to the American Federation of Labor or its officers either directly or indirectly by the hatters or anyone else. The Loewe Company was never published on the "We don't patronize" list of the American Federationist. We invite the inspection of the files of the American Federationist and of our office records in proof of this. We feel it our duty in the interest of truth and accuracy to call public attention to the error of the court in charging the American Federation of Labor with being a party to the action against the Loewe Company.

We can hardly believe that the Supreme Court itself realized the evil consequences which may follow this decision under its construction of the Sherman antitrust law, a construction never intended by Congress.

It may be like the falling pebble which dislodges the avalanche, bringing ruin and destruction upon all in its path. Should this be the result, it will follow from the nature and operation of the decision itself, not because of the protest of those affected.

We regard the members of the Supreme Bench as upright and incorruptible. We believe that in any decision handed down each judge honestly and conscientiously gives the opinion which he believes to be correct. We do not agree with those who charge the court with being influenced by sinister motives or under the domination of corporate influence.

But, while expressing our confidence in the integrity of the Supreme Court, we must also say that, being human, we do not consider it infallible in its judgments. We must accept them because, under our form of government, the Supreme Court is the highest legal tribunal. Right or wrong, there is no appeal from its decision. It is true that this is the only country possessing such a tribunal, and it is a subject for serious speculation whether we might not do better under some other form of procedure; but such speculation is useless so far as the immediate future is concerned.

We are proud of the institutions of our country and try to uphold them with all our power, but we do protest against the assumption of lawmaking power by the courts. In assuming such functions they invade the sphere of the legislative and executive, which must necessarily result injuriously to the very fabric of our Republic. Such action by the courts not being contemplated by the Constitution, there are no safeguards, no checks, as to what may be attempted. This assumption of power, even under the guise of construing existing law, is none the less dangerous, for decision of the court then becomes a law without the people ever having had an opportunity to take any part in the making or rejecting of it.

We trust it will not be considered lese majeste if we say that in our opinion the Supreme Court in this and other recent decisions affecting labor tends to revert to medieval procedure rather than make the application of legal principles to present the industrial situation. The conditions with all their complications are here and not of our making. Why should our highest tribunal ignore them and plunge the people into confusion and distress?

However, it is not so wonderful that the court takes this attitude.

The lifelong environment of the respected gentlemen who compose the Supreme Bench has been such that they have not been brought into personal contact with industrial problems. On the contrary, their associations have been largely with business and financial men and affairs. Naturally a man absorbs most of his point of view from his environment. It is quite understandable to us that justices of the Supreme Court should have little knowledge of modern industrial conditions and less sympathy with the efforts of the wage-workers to adapt themselves to the marvelous revolution which has taken place in industry in the past half century.

The language of the Hatters' decision makes it clear that the Supreme Court has not informed itself on modern economics. In its opinion the rights of hats seem to be greater than the rights of man. It seems to regard a hat as a sacred emblem of the rights of property; hence its protection is imperative. No effort, however, is made to protect the right of man to a fair return for his labor and the opportunity to labor under the prevailing conditions. In fact this decision goes to an unheard-of length in punishing the workers for the exercise of their rights.

We regret exceedingly that this is so. While again expressing our belief in the integrity of the court, we yet are convinced that it is the duty of this high tribunal to inform itself of the great principles underlying the economic conditions of our time. Were its members to do this, we believe they would perceive that a labor union can neither be a trust nor subject to trust laws. The decision refers to a book which seems to have suggested certain views. We would suggest that the members of the court read the chapter entitled "Some equivocal rights of labor," from the book Moral Overstrain, by George W. Alger. It will disclose the difference between essential remedies to relieve wrongs and the academic (?) rights which avail the workers nothing. While the union is not specifically declared a trust under this application of the Sherman Act, yet the Supreme Court construes for the punishment of the unions a law which was only intended to apply to illegal trusts. The wording of the law permits the penalty to attach whether the union is considered a trust, "or otherwise," so we can take our choice as to the nomenclature, but the penalties apply in any case.

From the fact that labor unions are declared punishable under trust penalties we feel that we should again point out how widely different is a labor union from a trust—for upon these vital and fundamental differences of the two are based the main reasons for our protest.

ORGANIZED LABOR NOT A TRUST.

The labor union is not a trust; none of its achievements in behalf of its members—and society at large—can properly be confounded with the pernicious and selfish activities of the illegal trust. A trust, even at its best, is an organization of the few to monopolize the production and control the distribution of a material product of some kind. The voluntary association of the workers for mutual benefit and assistance is essentially different. Even if they seek to control the disposition of their labor power, it must be remembered that the power to labor is not a material commodity.

There can not be a trust in something which is not yet produced.

The human power to produce is the antithesis of the material commodities which become the subject of trust control.

From its very nature the labor union can not be regarded as a trust, yet the Supreme Court seems not to have considered this vital distinction in arriving at its decision.

Public opinion is practically unanimous in recognizing the union as one of the most essential means of securing for the workman his rights, protecting him against injustice, and putting him in touch with all the best thought and most advanced movements of ethical forces of civilization.

The aims and purposes of our labor movement have often been stated before, but will bear brief restatement at this time, when the attempt is being made in many directions to so cripple the activities of our unions that they may be shorn of their usefulness.

Our unions aim to improve the standard of life, to uproot ignorance, and foster education; to instill character, manhood, and independent spirit among our people; to bring about a recognition of the interdependence of man upon his fellow-man. We aim to establish a normal workday, to take the children from the factory and workshop and give them the opportunity of the school, the home, and the playground. In a word, our unions strive to lighten toil, educate their members, make their homes more cheerful, and in every way contribute an earnest effort toward making life the better worth living. To achieve these praiseworthy ends we believe that all honorable and lawful means are both justifiable and commendable and should receive the sympathetic support of every right-thinking American.

If the workers are to be deprived of their opportunities for self-improvement and independence; if they are to be held at the will of the employer—and if this decision is enforced such might be the consequence—the industrial condition of our country would sink lower than that of slavery.

The slave owner was usually restrained from going to extremes in the treatment of his slaves by the fact that they represented property value to him, but if the industrial situation ensues indicated by this court decision, the wageworkers would be more under the control of the unscrupulous employer than was the slave under his owner.

We do not believe that the conscience and sense of justice of a large majority of employers will permit them to take advantage of the conditions possible under this decision. We believe that they and all good citizens will join with us in the earnest attempt to secure a remedy from Congress; but there is always the selfish, avaricious, conscienceless type of employer, and it gives us cause to think of the hardships and persecutions which such employers might inflict when their rapacity has the protection of a decree such as this recent one delivered by the Supreme Court.

At the time the Sherman antitrust law was passed we warned our members and the public that it was so drawn that we feared a construction would be read into it so as to apply it to our unions instead of to the trusts which it was intended to restrain.

The event which we feared has come to pass. The law has long been admitted to be of no value in restraining or really punishing trusts. Useless as an instrument of good, it has now been made an instrument of positive mischief, and perverted from its original intent.

We know the Sherman law was intended by Congress to punish illegal trusts and not the labor unions, for we had various conferences with Members of Congress while the Sherman Act was pending, and remember clearly that such a determination was stated again and again.

The judges of the Supreme Court should be aware of this, for the legislation has been enacted within their knowledge and memory. While not expecting infallibility on the part of the court, we do think it should acquire and act upon current information as to the intent of such an act as the Sherman antitrust law.

We would have supposed that the debates upon this subject in Congress would have had some weight in assisting judicial interpretation of application of the law. It apparently did, but in a most misleading way. In this decision the court says that some effort was made when the Sherman Act was pending in Congress to exclude organized labor and agricultural labor from its operation, but because such a clause was not made a specific part of the law the Supreme Court seems to find its justification for now applying it to organized labor.

BRIEF HISTORY OF SHERMAN ACT.

We believe that this view of the case is not supported by the facts in connection with the history of the Sherman antitrust law and the efforts made to amend it since its passage. We propose now to give this history at some length by quoting from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The antitrust bill was presented to the consideration of the Senate on February 28, 1890. The text of the bill contained but three sections in strict reference to corporation business. The bill was brought up from time to time by Senator Sherman, and it was just as often laid aside by other Senators. A substitute for the bill was introduced by the Committee on Finance on March 22, 1890, and on March 25 it was moved by Senator Morgan to commit the bill to the Judiciary Committee. His motion failed at that time on a vote of 16 yeas, 28 nays. The discussion of the bill continued as it was reported by the Finance Committee, and on the same day Senator Sherman offered a proviso at the end of the first section of the bill reported by the Committee on Finance. He said: "I take this proviso from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. George. I do not think it necessary, but at the same time, to avoid any confusion, I submit it to come in at the end of the first section."

Thus showing that Senator Sherman believed that the bill without the amendment excluded the laboring and agricultural organizations from the operation of the act. Indeed, in conference, he so expressed himself to the writer.

Amendment: "Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between the laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or the increasing of their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products."

Some discussion was had upon this amendment by Senators Plumb, Sherman, Ingalls, TELLER, Turpie, and Blair, and the word "their" was added between the words "of" and "own," in the last line of the amendment, so as to make it read "the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products," and with this single addition the amendment was agreed to.

Discussions continued, and on the following day, March 26, Senator Stewart, of Nevada, said:

"The original bill has been very much improved, and one of the great objections has been removed from it by the amendment offered by Senator Sherman, which relieves the class of persons who would have been first prosecuted under the original bill without the amendment. I am very much gratified that the Senator offered the amendment and that the Senate adopted it. The bill ought now, in some respects, to be satisfactory to every person who is opposed to the oppression of labor and desires to see it properly rewarded."

This amendment to the act was made while the Senate was sitting in Committee of the Whole.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill on March 27, and when the amendment just referred to was reached, Senator Sherman rose and said: "That is an amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and I call the attention of the Senate to it. In my judgment this amendment practically fritters away the substantial elements of this bill." Senator Blair corrected Senator Sherman and told him that the amendment referred to was one offered by himself and not by the Senator from Rhode Island.

A discussion followed, in which Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, participated. He opposed the amendment, but in the course of his remarks said:

"Well, here we are! I do not blame the farmers of the United States at all. On the contrary, I support them when everybody is turned against their interests in organizing themselves to defend them. But if capital and manufacturing industries begin to regulate, to repress, and diminish below what it ought to be the price of all labor everywhere that is engaged in that kind of business, labor must organize to defend itself."

Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, followed Senator Edmunds in the discussion upon this amendment as it offered to protect labor.

"I wish to state in one single sentence my opinion in regard to this particular provision. The Senator from Vermont thinks that the applying to laborers in this respect a principle which was not applied to persons engaged in the large commercial transactions which are chiefly affected by this bill was indefensible in principle. Now, it seems to me that there is a very broad distinction, which, if borne in mind, will warrant not only this exception to the provisions of the bill, but a great deal of other legislation which we enact or attempt to enact relating to the matter of labor. When you are providing to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat, iron, and other products, speculating or when they are lawfully dealing with them without speculation, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and the end of which is the making of money for the parties and nothing else. That is the only relation that transaction has to the state, but is the creation or division of much of the ownership of the wealth of the community, but when the laborer is trying to raise his wages, or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the government and the character of the state itself. The laborer who is engaged lawfully and usefully and accomplishes his purpose, in whole or in part, endeavoring to raise the standard of wages is engaged in the occupation the success of which makes republican government itself possible, and without which the republic can not, in substance, however it may in formation, continue to exist.

"I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements for the sake of maintaining in advance their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations who are themselves but an association or combination of capital on the other side. When we are promoting and even encouraging that, we are promoting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself."

Further discussion followed, and Senator Walthall, of Mississippi, moved to refer the bill and the amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report within twenty days, which carried by a vote of 31 yeas, 28 nays.

On April 2 the bill was reported out by the Committee on the Judiciary, but the amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole was not included.

Though at the time we doubted the wisdom of that amendment being omitted, we were assured by several that under the reconstructed bill labor and agricultural organizations were not included.

On April 8 the bill passed the Senate as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary by a vote of 52 yeas, 1 nay. It passed the House on June 21, 1890, and was approved July 2, 1890.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress a bill was introduced known as H. R. 10539, intended to amend the Sherman antitrust law. During its consideration by the House Committee on the Judiciary, representatives of the American Federation of Labor requested the adoption of the following amendment:

"Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to apply to trade unions or other labor organizations organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is to be performed."

The committee declined to accept this amendment; but when the bill was reported to the House, Representative Terry made the motion to adopt the amendment, which was agreed to, and the bill as amended passed the House by a vote of 259 yeas and 9 nays.

The bill then went to the Senate, but no action was taken; therefore it died on the expiration of that Congress.

Yet no one will pretend to say that both these quoted provisions excluding labor from the operation of the law were not the expression of the separate judgment of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, though not jointly enacted.

Does not this brief review of the history of legislation upon the subject of the Sherman Act clearly indicate what Congress had in mind when it enacted this legislation? And yet the Supreme Court assumes that, because both Houses did not jointly adopt a specific provision excluding the labor organizations from the operations of the antitrust laws, therefore they were included.

We must protest against the penalizing of the labor unions under the carelessly worded provisions of an antitrust law, which we understand since the court's decision has resulted in the grand jury of New Orleans indicting seventy-two workmen under its provisions, while at the same time the most vicious and rapacious trusts flourish and wax great upon the "restraint of trade and commerce" which they are able to exert, yet not all the machinery of our Government or of courts seems adequate to bring these real trust offenders to the place where the Sherman antitrust law really applies to them. In the confusion caused by this misapplication of the Sherman law to the labor unions, the illegal and vicious trusts are likely to still further escape punishment. Thus they may profit by the injustice done to labor.

The trend of legislation in civilized countries, including our own, has been to remove the associated efforts of the wage-earners for their mutual and common protection from the ban of conspiracy or the implication that they are in unlawful restraint of trade. As a matter of fact, and laws have been passed by other countries and in our own specifically declaring that the organizations of workmen instituted for the purpose of regulating hours of labor and other conditions of employment and increasing wages were not to be held as conspiracies or organizations in restraint of trade.

CONGRESSIONAL RELIEF IMPERATIVE.

We expect that the present Congress will take prompt action to so amend or modify the Sherman law that there can be no question as to its application. We shall ask such enactment restoring the rights of unions and agricultural associations, so that the association of human beings for education and progress may never again be confounded with the sordid and material activities of trusts. We believe that the people as a whole will be with us in this effort.

And even should Congress grant the desired relief in this case we shall still advise the utmost political activity on the part of our workers and friends. This decision has shown us the necessity of eternal vigilance.

It is well that Congress is in session at the time this decision is handed down, for we can now make our appeal directly to it for relief. We confidently expect that Congress will appreciate the injustice which has been done directly to the workers and hence indirectly to all the people. We believe that Congress will understand how important a portion of the body politic is comprised by the workers and will grant us the attention and prompt action which the injury merits. Congress must of necessity declare itself either for or against us at this time, and should it fail to heed our request for justice we shall at once appeal to all the people to help us right our wrongs by electing Representatives pledged to the interests of the people.

Already some bills have been introduced seeking to amend the Sherman law. When a bill has been perfected which will remedy the injustice done to labor by the recent court decision, it will be presented to Congress for consideration and every effort made to press it to passage.

Instead of being disheartened by this decision of the Supreme Court our labor forces will only be cemented the more closely by the danger which threatens.

This decision will mean a greater awakening for labor than ever before. In fact we feel assured that the people as a whole will join with us in securing Representatives in Congress who will really represent the industrial, political, material interests of the masses. This work of safeguarding the interests and moral welfare of the workers and of all the people has already begun. It will be carried on with greater vigor since this decision shows the necessity of our being ably, firmly, clearly, and fully represented in Congress so that it will be impossible for the Supreme Court in future to ignore or misunderstand.

Our fellow-workers and the people as a whole will unite industrially and politically for the safeguarding and protecting of their interests. All need a more widespread knowledge of economic conditions and the trend of modern industry. In this effort we shall have the appreciation and assistance of all our people.

Another thing must not be forgotten. The union is a necessary and inevitable outgrowth of our modern industrial condition. To deny the union the exercise of its normal activities for the protection and advancement of its members and the advancement of society in general is to do a great injury to all the people.

This repression of right and natural activities is bound to finally break forth in violent form of protest, especially among the more ignorant of the people who, if penalized, as they may be under this decree, will feel great bitterness that they are deprived of the opportunity to improve their conditions by voluntary association.

LABOR NOT DISHEARTENED.

The work and methods of the trade unions and labor organizations are, by the very nature of their large numbers, an open book. All men may know the actions and the doings of the labor unions. The loyal labor papers publish broadcast the aims and progress of the labor movement. The unions appeal to the intelligence, the character, the manhood, the patriotism, and the humanity of the workers and our fellow-man for sympathetic and helpful cooperation. Do the opponents of labor organizations imagine that they can crush the spirit and independence of the men of labor?

Can they imagine themselves in the "Fool's Paradise" where they have succeeded in eliminating the organizations of labor from our public life and body politic, these unions which have done so much to protect and promote the rights and interest and well-being of the American workman? It is inconceivable, but were it at all possible and the organizations of labor driven out of existence, what then?

Does any one imagine that America's workers will submit to the injustice, the greed, and rapacity of unchecked corporate wealth without some form of resistance?

Kill the trade and labor unions of America; drive them out of existence by legislation and court decrees, and then each worker will be an irresponsible person, without association with his fellows, without opportunity for consultation, and without the constructive influence which open organization gives. Then will he seek his own redress in his own way.

Is such a chaotic condition desirable or preferable to the normal, rational, intelligent, peaceful organizations of labor of our time? We opine not. Such a condition must not and will not transpire.

The American labor movement is founded upon the inherent principles of justice and right. Its men are loyal—as loyal to the institutions of our Republic as can be found in any walk of life. The unions of labor have done so much for the material, moral, and social uplift of the toilers that they are indelibly impressed upon the hearts and minds, not only of the workers themselves but of every earnest, intelligent, liberty-loving, fair-minded citizen of our country.

The unions of labor will live. They can not be—they must not be—they will not be driven out of existence. Labor demands relief at the hands of Congress; demands it now.

It should be borne in mind that there is no law, aye, not even a court decision, compelling union men or their friends of labor to buy a Buck's stove or range. No, not even to buy a Loewe hat.

TO ORGANIZED LABOR AND FRIENDS.

It has seldom occurred that I have found it necessary to use the first person in addressing my fellow-workers and the people through the editorial columns of the American Federationist. What follows here refers to such an extraordinary circumstance and affects the labor organizations, their members, and our friends so fundamentally that I am impelled to address them in the most direct manner. The Supreme Court of the United States on February 3, 1908, rendered a decision in the case of the hat manufacturer Loewe against the United Hatters of North America, and decreed that the Loewe suit for threefold damages can be maintained under the Sherman antitrust law. The Supreme Court holds that the action of the hatters, as described in the complaint, is a combination "in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States" in the sense in which those words are used in the Sherman law.

A decision by the Supreme Court, the highest tribunal of the country, is law and must be obeyed, regardless of whether or not we believe the decision to be a just one.

We protest that the trade unions of the country should not be penalized under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. In fact, I know that Congress never intended the law to apply to the labor unions, but the Supreme Court rules that it shall apply to them; therefore, pending action by Congress to define our status and restore our rights by modifying or amending the Sherman law, there is no alternative for labor but to obey the mandate of the court.

Under this decision the publication of a "We don't patronize" list in the American Federationist, or any other publication, makes the organization and the individuals composing it liable to monetary damages and imprisonment (see sections 1, 2, and 7 of Sherman law quoted elsewhere). This being the case, I feel obliged to discontinue the "We don't patronize" list.

This course I pursue upon the advice of the legal counsel of the American Federation of Labor, as to the far-reaching character of the decision of the Supreme Court. This action is also advised by my colleagues of the executive council.

I have no words adequate to express the regret I feel at being obliged to take this action, especially as in the opinion of competent lawyers—and their opinion is shared by many other laymen as well as myself—this decision by the Supreme Court is unwarranted and unjust, but until Congressional relief can be obtained it must undoubtedly be binding upon us all. Were it only myself personally who might suffer, for conscience' sake I should not hesitate to risk every penalty, even unto the extreme, in defense of what I believe to be labor's rights. In this case of the adverse court decision, and indeed, in every other circumstance which may arise, I think those who know me do not question my loyalty, devotion, and willingness to bear fully any responsibility involved in the forwarding of the cause to which my life is pledged; but unfortunately, the terms of the decision are such that no one person, even though president of the American Federation of Labor and willing to assume entire responsibility, will be permitted to take upon himself the sole penalty of protest against what I and every member of every organization affiliated to the American Federation of Labor, and, indeed, every patriotic citizen must feel to be a most sweeping dragnet decision, making the natural and rational voluntary action of workmen unlawful and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Personal willingness to bear the penalty would avail nothing in this instance to spare the other men of labor and our organizations from the penalties decreed to them by the Supreme Court; in fact, such an attempt on my part would involve a vast number of people who would be held equally responsible with me.

I would fail in performing my duty, though it is a painful one, did I not point out that under this decision each and every officer and member of every labor organization becomes liable for any violation of the decision by anyone, not only as to his organization but individually, to the extent of whatever his possessions may be.

I think our men of labor will agree with me that I have no right to expose them to the heavy penalty for disobedience under this decision of the Supreme Court.

I will say briefly here, as I do more fully editorially, that while obeying the decision of the court I feel most deeply that never in the history of our country has there been so serious an invasion of the rights and liberties of our people.

Under the court's construction of the Sherman law the voluntary and peaceful associations of labor that are organized for the uplifting of the workers, these unions, I say, are made the greatest offenders under the antitrust law.

It is almost unbelievable that our unions which perform so important a service in the interest of civilization and moral and material progress are to be accorded the treatment of malefactors. Yet the more carefully this decision is read the more absolutely clear does it become that our unions are to be penalized by it, as the most vicious of trusts were intended to be, yet the trusts still go unpunished.

I have a strong hope that Congress will promptly take heed of the injustice that has been done the workers, and will so amend or modify the Sherman antitrust law that the labor unions will be restored to the exercise of the powers and rights guaranteed to all our citizens under the Constitution.

It is not conceivable that Congress will turn a deaf ear to the rightful demand of the workers of the country for relief from this most amazing decision, but until such time as relief is assured, I am compelled, for the safety of our men of labor, to obey literally the decision of the Supreme Court; but this situation created by the court must be met. It will be met.

While abiding by this decision, I urge most strongly upon my fellow-unionists everywhere to be more energetic than ever before in organizing the yet unorganized, in standing together, in uniting and federating for the common good.

Be more active than ever before in using every lawful and honorable means, not only to secure relief from the present situation at the hands of Congress, but in the doing of everything which may promote the uplifting and noble work of our great cause of humanity. Like all great causes it must meet temporary opposition, but in the end it will accomplish all the more on account of the trials endured.

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

[Editorial from American Federalist by President Samuel Gompers.]

The Supreme Court on January 23 decided that clause in the Erdman Act which provided that railroads might not discharge employees for belonging to a labor union was an interference with "feedom of contract." This means, in plain language, that corporations may have the freedom to blacklist men for being members of labor organizations.

Mark the inconsistency of the Supreme Court. In the hatters' case it declares that the boycott used by the workers is a conspiracy and punishable by heavy penalties. In the Adair case, brought under the Erdman Act, it gives a decision which will permit employers to use the blacklist as freely as they please and the wageworkers will have no redress.

Employers may use the blacklist, but wageworkers may not use the boycott. Both decisions are unjust to labor.

The boycott concerns only the manipulation of material products. The blacklist is the denial of the opportunity for a man to work. To blacklist a man—deny him the right to labor—is to deny him the right to live. Humanity was shocked at the discovery of the reconcentrado camps in Cuba, where the Spanish penned in their victims to die by slow starvation, before the Spanish war, yet the blacklist erects as real a barrier—though invisible—around the worker under its ban, and he is often equally condemned to the horrors of slow starvation for himself and his family. It must be remembered that the blacklisted man is often refused employment on any terms—and for what? Not that he is guilty of crime, but because he has associated with his fellows in a labor union. Much freedom of contract for the wageworkers forsooth under the operation of the blacklist!

We hope this decree will prove so repugnant to the country that no employer will be tempted to use it under the shield of the Supreme Court decision. It is another case for Congressional relief.

SUPREME COURT DECISION—DIETRICH LOEWE ET AL. V. MARTIN LAWLOR ET AL.

[February 3, 1908.]

On a writ of certiorari to the United States circuit court of appeals for the second circuit.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought in the circuit court for the district of Connecticut under section 7 of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, claiming threefold damages for injuries inflicted on plaintiffs by combination or conspiracy declared to be unlawful by the act.

Defendants filed a demurrer to the complaint, assigning general and special grounds. The demurrer was sustained as to the first six paragraphs, which rested on the ground that the combination stated was not within the Sherman Act, and this rendered it unnecessary to pass upon any other questions in the case; and, upon plaintiffs declining to amend their complaint, the court dismissed it with costs. (148 Fed. Rep., 924; and see 142 Fed. Rep., 216; 130 Fed. Rep., 633.)

The case was then carried by writ of error to the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, and that court, desiring the instruction of this court upon a question arising on the writ of error, certified that question to this court. The certificate consisted of a brief statement of facts, and put the question thus: "Upon this state of facts, can plaintiffs maintain an action against defendants under section 7 of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890?"

After the case on certificate had been docketed here plaintiffs in error applied, and defendants in error joined in the application, to this court to require the whole record and cause to be sent up for its consideration. The application was granted, and the whole record and cause being thus brought before this court it devolved upon the court, under section 6 of the judiciary act of 1891, to "decide the whole matter in controversy in the same manner as if it had been brought there for review by writ of error or appeal."

The case comes up, then, on complaint and demurrer, and we give the complaint in the margin.

The question is whether upon the facts therein averred and admitted by the demurrer this action can be maintained under the antitrust act.

The first, second, and seventh sections of that act are as follows:

"1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"7. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation, by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act, may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

In our opinion, the combination described in the declaration is a combination "in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States," in the sense in which those words are used in the act, and the action can be maintained accordingly.

And that conclusion rests on many judgments of this court, to the effect that the act prohibits any combination whatever to secure action which essentially obstructs the free flow of commerce between the States, or restricts, in that regard, the liberty of a trader to engage in business.

The combination charged falls within the class of restraints of trade aimed at compelling third parties and strangers involuntarily not to engage in the course of trade except on conditions that the combination imposes; and there is no doubt that (to quote from the well-known work of Chief Justice Erle on trade unions) "at common law every person has individually, and the public also has collectively, a right to require that the course of trade should be kept free from unreasonable obstruction." But the objection here is to the jurisdiction, because, even conceding that the declaration states a case good at common law, it is contended that it does not state one within the statute.

Thus, it is said, that the restraint alleged would operate to entirely destroy defendants' business and thereby include intrastate trade as well; that physical obstruction is not alleged as contemplated, and that defendants are not themselves engaged in interstate trade.

We think none of these objections are tenable, and that they are disposed of by previous decisions of this court.

United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S., 290; United States v. Joint Traffic Association, 171 U. S., 505, and Northern Securities Company v. United States, 193 U. S., 197, hold in effect that the antitrust law has a broader application than the prohibition of restraints of trade unlawful at common law. Thus in the Trans-Missouri case it was said that, "assuming that agreements of this nature are not void at common law, and that the various cases cited by the learned courts below show it, the answer to the statement of their validity is to be found in the terms of the statute under consideration;" and in the Northern Securities case that "the act declares illegal every contract, combination, or conspiracy in whatever form, of whatever nature, and whoever may be the parties to it, which directly or necessarily operates in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States."

We do not pause to comment on cases such as United States v. Knight, 156 U. S., 1; Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S., 578, and Anderson v. United States, Id., 604, in which the undisputed facts showed that the purpose of the agreement was not to obstruct or restrain interstate commerce. The object and intention of the combination determined its legality.

In Swift v. United States, 196 U. S., 395, a bill was brought against a number of corporations, firms, and individuals of different States, alleging that they were engaged in interstate commerce in the purchase, sale, transportation, and delivery, and subsequent resale at the point of delivery, of meats; and that they combined to refrain from bidding against each other in the purchase of cattle; to maintain a uniform price at which the meat should be sold; and to maintain uniform charges in delivering meats thus sold through the channels of interstate trade to the various dealers and consumers in other States. And that thus they artificially restrained commerce in fresh meats from the purchase and shipment of live stock from the plains to the final distribution of the meats to the consumers in the markets of the country.

Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the court, said:

"Commerce among the States is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of business. When cattle are sent for sale from a place in one State with the expectation that they will end their transit after purchase in another, and when in effect they do so, with only the interruption necessary to find a purchaser at the stock yards, and when this is a typical, constantly recurring course, the current thus existing is a current of commerce among the States, and the purchase of the cattle is a part and incident of such commerce.

"The general objection is urged that the bill does not set forth sufficient definite or specific facts. This objection is serious, but it seems to us inherent in the nature of the case. The scheme alleged is so vast that it presents a new problem in pleading. If, as we must assume, the scheme is entertained, it is, of course, contrary to the very words of the statute. Its size makes the violation of the law more conspicuous, and yet the same thing makes it impossible to fasten the principal fact to a certain time and place. The elements, too, are so numerous and shifting, even the constituent parts alleged are and from their nature must be so extensive in time and space that something of the same impossibility applies to them.

"The scheme as a whole seems to us to be within reach of the law. The constituent elements, as we have stated them, are enough to give to the scheme a body and, for all that we can say, to accomplish it. Moreover, whatever we may think of them separately, when we take them up as distinct charges, they are alleged sufficiently as elements of a scheme. It is suggested that the several acts charged are lawful and that intent can make no difference. But they are bound together as parts of a single plan. The plan may make the parts unlawful."

And the same principle was expressed in Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S., 194, involving a statute of Wisconsin prohibiting combinations "for the purpose of willfully or maliciously injuring another in his reputation, trade, business, or profession by any means whatever," etc., in which Mr. Justice Holmes said:

"The statute is directed against a series of acts, and acts of several, the acts of combining, with intent to do other acts. 'The very plot is an act in itself.' Mulcahy v. The Queen, L. R., 3, H. L., 306, 317. But an act, which in itself is merely a voluntary muscular contraction, derives all its character from the consequences which will follow it under the circumstances in which it was done. When the acts consist of making a combination calculated to cause temporal damage, the power to punish such acts, when done maliciously, can not be denied because they are to be followed and worked out by conduct which might have been lawful if not preceded by the acts. No conduct has such an absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be made a step in a criminal plot, and if it is a step in a plot neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to prevent the punishment of the plot by law."

In Addyston Pipe and Steel Company v. United States, 175 U. S., 211, the petition alleged that the defendants were practically the only manufacturers of cast iron within thirty-six States and Territories; that they had entered into a combination by which they agreed not to compete with each other in the sale of pipe, and the territory through which the constituent companies could make sales was allotted between them. This court held that the agreement which, prior to any act of transportation, limited the prices at which the pipe could be sold after transportation, was within the law. Mr. Justice Peckham delivering the opinion, said: "And when Congress has enacted a statute such as the one in question, any agreement or combination which directly operates not alone upon the manufacture, but upon the sale, transportation, and delivery of an article of interstate commerce," by preventing or restricting its sale, etc., thereby regulates interstate commerce.

In Montague & Company v. Lowry, 193 U. S., 38, which was an action brought by a private citizen under section 7 against a combination engaged in the manufacture of tiles, defendants were wholesale dealers in tiles in California and combined with manufacturers in other States to restrain the interstate traffic in tiles by refusing to sell any tiles to any wholesale dealer in California who was not a member of the association except at a prohibitive rate. The case was a commercial boycott against such dealers in California as would not or could not obtain membership in the association. The restraint did not consist in a physical obstruction of interstate commerce, but in the fact that the plaintiff and other independent dealers could not purchase their tiles from manufacturers in other States because such manufacturers had combined to boycott them. This court held that this obstruction to the purchase of tiles, a fact antecedent to physical transportation, was within the prohibition of the act. Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the court, said, concerning the agreement, that it "restrained trade, for it narrowed the market for the sale of tiles in California from the manufacturers and dealers therein in other States, so that they could only be sold to the members of the association, and it enhanced prices to the nonmember."

The averments here are that there was an existing interstate traffic between plaintiffs and citizens of other States, and that for the direct purpose of destroying such interstate traffic defendants combined not merely to prevent plaintiffs from manufacturing articles then and there intended for transportation beyond the State, but also to prevent the vendees from reselling the hats which they had imported from Connecticut, or from further negotiating with plaintiffs for the purchase and intertransportation of such hats from Connecticut to the various places of destination. So that, although some of the means whereby the interstate traffic was to be destroyed were acts within a State and some of them were in themselves as a part of their obvious purpose and effect beyond the scope of Federal authority, still as we have seen, the acts must be considered as a whole, and the plan is open to condemnation, notwithstanding a negligible amount of intrastate business might be affected in carrying it out. If the purposes of the combination were, as alleged, to prevent any interstate transportation at all, the fact that the means operated at one end before physical transportation commenced and at the other end after the physical transportation ended was immaterial.

Nor can the act in question be held inapplicable because defendants were not themselves engaged in interstate commerce. The act made no distinction between classes. It provided that "every" contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade was illegal. The records of Congress show that several efforts were made to exempt by legislation organizations of farmers and laborers from the operation of the act, and that all these efforts failed, so that the act remained as we have it before us.

In an early case, United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council (54 Fed. Rep., 994), the United States filed a bill under the Sherman act in the circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana, averring the existence of "a gigantic and widespread combination of the members of a multitude of separate organizations for the purpose of restraining the commerce among the several States and with foreign countries" and it was contended that the statute did not refer to combinations of laborers. But the court, granting the injunction, said:

"I think the Congressional debates show that the statute had its origin in the evils of massed capital; but, when the Congress came to formulating the prohibition, which is the yardstick for measuring the complainant's right to the injunction, it expressed it in these words: 'Every contract or combination in the form of trust, or otherwise in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal.' The subject had so broadened in the minds of the legislators that the source of the evil was not regarded as material, and the evil in its entirety is dealt with. They made the interdiction include combinations of labor as well as of capital; in fact, all combinations in restraint of commerce, without reference to the character of the persons who entered into them. It is true this statute has not been much expounded by judges, but, as it seems to me, its meaning, as far as relates to the sort of combinations to which it is to apply, is manifest and that it includes combinations which are composed of laborers acting in the interest of laborers."

* * * * * * *

"It is the successful effort of the combination of the defendants to intimidate and overawe others who were at work in conducting or carrying on the commerce of the country, in which the court finds their error and their violation of the statute. One of the intended results of their combined action was the forced stagnation of all the commerce which flowed through New Orleans. This intent and combined action are none the less unlawful because they included in their scope the paralysis of all other business within the city as well."

The case was affirmed on appeal by the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit. (57 Fed. Rep., 85.)

Subsequently came the litigation over the Pullman strike and the decisions In re Debs (64 Fed. Rep., 724, 745, 755; 158 U. S., 564). The bill in that case was filed by the United States against the officers of the American Railway Union, which alleged that a labor dispute existed between the Pullman Palace Car Company and its employees; that thereafter the four officers of the railway union combined together and with others to compel an adjustment of such dispute by creating a boycott against the cars of the car company; that to make such boycott effective they had already prevented certain of the railroads running out of Chicago from operating their trains; that they asserted that they could and would tie up, paralyze, and break down any and every railroad which did not accede to their demands, and that the purpose and intention of the combination was "to secure unto themselves the entire control of the interstate, industrial, and commercial business in which the population of the city of Chicago and of other communities along the lines of road of said railways are engaged with each other, and to restrain any and all other persons from any independent control or management of such interstate, industrial, or commercial enterprises, save according to the will and with the consent of the defendants."

The circuit court proceeded principally upon the Sherman antitrust law, and granted an injunction. In this court the case was rested upon the broader ground that the Federal Government had full power over interstate commerce and over the transmission of the mails, and in the exercise of those powers could remove everything put upon highways, natural or artificial, to obstruct the passage of interstate commerce or the carrying of the mails. But in reference to the antitrust act the court expressly stated:

"We enter into an examination of the act of July 2, 1890 (c. 647, 26 Stat., 209), upon which the circuit court relied mainly to sustain its jurisdiction. It must not be understood from this that we dissent from the conclusions of that court in reference to the scope of the act, but simply that we prefer to rest our judgment on the broader ground which has been discussed in this opinion, believing it of importance that the principles underlying it should be fully stated and affirmed."

And in the opinion Mr. Justice Brewer, among other things, said:

"It is curious to note the fact that in a large proportion of the cases in respect to interstate commerce brought to this court the question presented was of the validity of State legislation in its bearings upon interstate commerce, and the uniform course of decision has been to declare that it is not within the competency of a State to legislate in such a manner as to obstruct interstate commerce. If a State, with its recognized powers of sovereignty, is impotent to obstruct interstate commerce, can it be that any mere voluntary association of individuals within the limits of that State has a power which the State itself does not possess?"

The question answers itself, and in the light of the authorities the only inquiry is as to the sufficiency of the averments of fact. We have given the declaration in full in the margin, and it appears therefrom that it is charged that defendants formed a combination to directly restrain plaintiffs' trade; that the trade to be restrained was interstate; that certain means to attain such restraint were contrived to be used and employed to that end; that those means were so used and employed by defendants, and that thereby they injured plaintiffs' property and business.

At the risk of tediousness, we repeat that the complaint averred that plaintiffs were manufacturers of hats in Danbury, Conn., having a factory there, and were then and there engaged in an interstate trade in some twenty States other than the State of Connecticut; that they were practically dependent upon such interstate trade to consume the product of their factory, only a small percentage of their entire output being consumed in the State of Connecticut; that at the time the alleged combination was formed they were in the process of manufacturing a large number of hats for the purpose of fulfilling engagements then actually made with consignees and wholesale dealers in States other than Connecticut, and that if prevented from carrying on the work of manufacturing these hats they would be unable to complete their engagements.

That defendants were members of a vast combination called The United Hatters of North America, comprising about 9,000 members and including a large number of subordinate unions, and that they were combined with some 1,400,000 others into another association known as the American Federation of Labor, of which they were members, whose members resided in all the places in the several States where the wholesale dealers in hats and their customers resided and did business; that defendants were "engaged in a combined scheme and effort to force all manufacturers of fur hats in the United States, including the plaintiffs, against their will and their previous policy of carrying on their business, to organize their workmen in the departments of making and finishing, in each of their factories, into an organization, to be part and parcel of the said combination known as The United Hatters of North America, or as the defendants and their confederates term it, to unionize their shops, with the intent thereby to control the employment of labor in and the operation of said factories, and to subject the same to the direction and control of persons, other than the owners of the same, in a manner extremely onerous and distasteful to such owners, and to carry out such scheme, effort, and purpose by restraining and destroying the interstate trade and commerce of such manufacturers by means of intimidation of and threats made to such manufacturers and their customers in the several States, of boycotting them, their product, and their customers, using therefor all the powerful means at their command as aforesaid, until such time as, from the damage and loss of business resulting therefrom, the said manufacturers should yield to the said demand to unionize their factories."

That the conspiracy or combination was so far progressed that out of 82 manufacturers of this country engaged in the production of fur hats 70 had accepted the terms and acceded to the demand that the shop should be conducted in accordance, so far as conditions of employment were concerned, with the will of the American Federation of Labor; that the local union demanded of plaintiffs that they should unionize their shop under peril of being boycotted by this combination, which demand defendants declined to comply with; that thereupon the American Federation of Labor, acting through its official organ and through its organizers, declared a boycott.

"20. On or about July 25, 1902, the defendants individually and collectively, and as members of said combinations and associations, and with other persons whose names are unknown to the plaintiffs, associated with them, in pursuance of the general scheme and purpose aforesaid, to force all manufacturers of fur hats, and particularly the plaintiffs, to so unionize their factories, wantonly, wrongfully, maliciously, unlawfully, and in violation of the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, and entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' and with intent to injure the property and business of the plaintiffs by means of acts done which are forbidden and declared to be unlawful by said act of Congress, entered into a combination and conspiracy to restrain the plaintiffs and their customers in States other than Connecticut in carrying on said trade and commerce among the several States and to wholly prevent them from engaging in and carrying on said trade and commerce between them and to prevent the plaintiffs from selling their hats to wholesale dealers and purchasers in said States other than Connecticut, and to prevent said dealers and customers in said other States from buying the same and to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining orders for their hats from such customers and filling the same and shipping said hats to said customers in said States as aforesaid and thereby injure the plaintiffs in their property and business and to render unsalable the product and output of their said factory, so the subject of interstate commerce, in whosoever's hands the same might be or come, through said interstate trade and commerce, and to employ as means to carry out said combination and conspiracy and the purposes thereof and accomplish the same, the following measures and acts, viz.:

"To cause, by means of threats and coercion, and without warning or information to the plaintiffs, the concerted and simultaneous withdrawal of all the makers and finishers of hats then working for them, who were not members of their said combination, The United Hatters of North America, as well as those who were such members, and thereby cripple the operation of the plaintiffs' factory, and prevent the plaintiffs from filling a large number of orders then on hand, from such wholesale dealers in States other than Connecticut, which they had engaged to fill and were then in the act of filling, as was well known to the defendants; in connection therewith to declare a boycott against all hats made for sale and sold and delivered, or to be so sold or delivered, by the plaintiffs to said wholesale dealers in States other than Connecticut, and to actively boycott the same and the business of those who should deal in them, and thereby prevent the sale of the same by those in whose hands they might be or come through said interstate trade in said several States; to procure and cause others of said combinations united with them in said A. F. of L. in like manner to declare a boycott against and to actively boycott the same and the business of such wholesale dealers as should buy or sell them, and of those who should purchase them from such wholesale dealers; to intimidate such wholesale dealers from purchasing or dealing in the hats of the plaintiffs by informing them that the A. F. of L. had declared a boycott against the product of the plaintiffs and against any dealer who should handle it, and that the same was to be actively pressed against them, and by distributing circulars containing notices that such dealers and their customers were to be boycotted; to threaten with a boycott those customers who should buy any goods whatever, even though union made, of such boycotted dealers, and at the same time to notify such wholesale dealers that they were at liberty to deal in the hats of any other nonunion manufacturer of similar quality to those made by the plaintiffs, but must not deal in the hats made by the plaintiffs under threats of such boycotting; to falsely represent to said wholesale dealers and their customers, that the plaintiffs had discriminated against the union men in their employ, had thrown them out of employment because they refused to give up their union cards and teach boys, who were intended to take their places after seven months' instruction, and had driven their employees to extreme measures 'by their persistent, unfair, and un-American policy of antagonizing union labor, forcing wages to a starvation scale, and given boys and cheap, unskilled foreign labor preference over experienced and capable union workmen,' in order to intimidate said dealers from purchasing said hats by reason of the prejudice thereby created against the plaintiffs and the hats made by them among those who might otherwise purchase them; to use the said union label of said The United Hatters of North America as an instrument to aid them in carrying out said conspiracy and combination against the plaintiffs' and their customers' intertrade aforesaid, and in connection with the boycotting above mentioned, for the purpose of describing and identifying the hats of the plaintiffs and singling them out to be so boycotted; to employ a large number of agents to visit said wholesale dealers and their customers, at their several places of business, and threaten them with loss of business if they should buy or handle the hats of the plaintiffs, and thereby prevent them from buying said hats, and in connection therewith to cause said dealers to be waited upon by committees representing large combinations of persons in their several localities to make similar threats to them; to use the daily press in the localities where such wholesale dealers reside, and do business, to announce and advertise the said boycotts against the hats of the plaintiffs and said wholesale dealers, and thereby make the same more effective and oppressive, and to use the columns of their said paper, The Journal of the United Hatters of North America, for that purpose, and to describe the acts of their said agents in prosecuting the same."

And then followed the averments that the defendants proceeded to carry out their combination to restrain and destroy interstate trade and commerce between plaintiffs and their customers in other States by employing the identical means contrived for that purpose; and that by reason of those acts plaintiffs were damaged in their business and property in some $80,000.

We think a case within the statute was set up and that the demurrer should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded with a direction to proceed accordingly.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that decision is the supreme law of the land, and a cynic has recently defined "the supreme law of the land" to be the last guess of the United States Supreme Court. In my opinion there is a great distinction between the legal responsibility of a corporation and a trades union. They differ widely. A corporation is an artificial person created by law, and what the State creates the State has a right to regulate. The trades union is a voluntary association of free individuals possessed of the same rights of action as belong to individuals and destitute of corporate rights and corporate responsibility. The judges and lawyers of England and America invented for labor unions the rule of corporate responsibility and sought to punish their acts as conspiracies in restraint of trade. This legal notion the English statute expressly abolished and made it lawful for an association of workingmen to do whatever is legal for an individual workingman to do. This wise legislation has been embodied in the laws of Pennsylvania, Michigan, and other enlightened Commonwealths. It has not yet been adopted by the Congress, but I feel confident that it will be and ought to be before this session adjourns, and then it must be recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, just a few words more. I want to say that I am now, always have been, and always expect to be the friend of the toilers of the country. Anything I can ever do, in Congress or out of Congress, to promote their interests and protect their rights I shall do cheerfully. I believe in the rights of man and in the dignity of labor. All that we are and all that we hope to be we owe to the workers of our country. This decision of the Supreme Court seems to regard the rights of hats as superior to the rights of man. In my opinion a labor union or a trades union organized to promote the interests and protect the rights of labor is not a trust, never was a trust, and never will be a trust, in the true contemplation and construction of the provisions of the so-called "antitrust act of 1890." I shall not at this time, however, discuss this matter in detail. Mr. Gompers has done that in a masterful way, and my object in taking the floor to-day was for the purpose of placing his views regarding this sweeping decision in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and I trust that the legislation now demanded by the American Federation of Labor in this connection and in other matters of moment may be enacted into laws before this session of Congress adjourns. Labor appeals to us now from one end of the country to the other. The question of the hour is, Will the Congress hear? Will the Congress heed? Will the Congress respond?

Mr. BOWERS. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE].

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, this being the long session of Congress, it is but natural and right that it should be expected to give due consideration to all matters of general legislation, and then to enact such laws as are demanded and needed by the country. But a very different policy from this we are given to understand has been agreed upon, which is that we are to hurry to their passage the appropriation bills, let all other legislation go, and adjourn not later than the 15th of May or sooner if possible. If this programme is to be carried out, and I doubt not but what it will be, it is significant in its meaning, for it means that all the needed legislation must necessarily wait until the next long session, which will be two years in the future.

No Congress ever had a better opportunity to pass both needed and beneficial legislation than this one has. Conditions seem to be exactly right, and they demand immediate action and not delay. From the Dakotas to Texas and from California to New York we have been overwhelmed with petitions, resolutions, and private letters from boards of trade, trades unions, farmers' unions, partnerships, and private citizens asking Congress to pass such laws as the business conditions and the industrial development of the country demand.

In addition to these the President has already sent us three messages, and I understand he is now busily engaged in the preparation of the fourth, which will be sent in in the next few days, urging Congress to pass needed laws. The greater part of the laws asked for in these messages are good and ought to be enacted. And if we persist in adjourning without passing them I sincerely hope that he will call an extra session before we get out of town, although I confess that I do not think he will do it. The future student of history will not waste much time in finding out what the first session of the Sixtieth Congress accomplished, but will find it a very interesting study to note the great number of things it left undone. Let me call attention to some of them, and my time will only permit me to do so briefly.

It is now plain that we are to have no river and harbor bill this Congress, and no money is to be appropriated for the improvement of our rivers and harbors this year. That this much-needed improvement is to be thus neglected is to be generally regretted, for never before has there been such a universal demand for river improvement as there is now from every quarter. There seems to be an enthusiasm and desire for river improvement never before known. The demand is to improve our rivers and thereby give us cheaper and better transportation facilities for our rapidly increasing productions. On the 26th of February the President sent a special message to Congress urging the necessity for river improvement, not next year or at some time in the future, but now, he says.

The report of the Waterways Commission, which he at the time transmitted, certainly shows the necessity for paying some attention to the message and its recommendations. It is shown by this report that we now have 25,000 miles of navigable rivers and 25,000 miles more that could be made navigable by proper improvement, not including canals and bays. With this splendid showing as to the number and length of these great natural highways of commerce, the startling information is given that while our rivers are the best, yet they are at the same time less used and more generally neglected than are those of any other civilized country in the world. Our attention is also called to the fact that much of the money heretofore appropriated for river improvement has been wasted, because of the fact that a sufficient sum had not been given to carry on successfully the work undertaken.

Nowhere can this almost criminal neglect of waterway improvement be more clearly shown and demonstrated than in my own State. The State of Arkansas has almost, if not quite, as many miles of navigable rivers as has any State in the Union. Yet the sum annually expended for their improvement by the Government is so small that Congress and everybody connected with it ought to be ashamed of it.

We are not even permitted to have an engineer to reside in the State, and all estimates made and submitted to the War Department and to Congress as to the character of the improvements to be made, and the amount of money to be expended therefor, must be made by an engineer who resides in another State.

The efforts of the entire delegation of the State to have a competent engineer sent to Little Rock have been unavailing, and we must still wait to see how much longer this injustice is to continue.

The next important legislation we are neglecting is the failure to pass a drainage bill. If one should be passed, as it ought to be, it would just now serve a double purpose. It would serve primarily to aid in navigation and greatly benefit the public health, and it would serve, in the second place, to redeem in many of our States thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres of the most fertile and valuable lands they have in them; would convert them from worthless, valueless swamps into magnificent farms and plantations. These lands would find their way upon the tax books and would aid in bearing the burdens of taxation in the different States and would add untold millions to the permanent and lasting wealth of this country.

We are further confronted with the fact that we are to have no employers' liability act passed. And this is another one of the pressing necessities for legislation that the President has called the attention of Congress to in one of his special messages and one I think that ought to be acted upon. For when we remember how difficult it is in the several States to have a good and sufficient employers' liability act passed by the State legislature, for the reason that the railroad companies have generally been enabled by some influence or in some manner to prevent it, it does seem to me that it is high time that Congress should set the splendid example by passing the act the President has asked to have passed, and yet everybody now knows that we are not even going to be given an opportunity to consider such a bill.

It is also a matter of common knowledge that there will be no public buildings bill this year, or if there is one, it is to be a very small and insignificant affair. My information is that there are bills pending before this Congress asking for public buildings in the different States that would require an expenditure of something like $80,000,000, and they, too, are not to be considered.

Towns and cities are to-day suffering for the lack of adequate and suitable public buildings. Communities without number are to-day deprived of a decent post-office building from which to get their mail and must continue to go to buildings which are inadequate, unsanitary, crowded to overflowing, and totally insufficient, but they must endure the ills and wrongs for two more years at least, for Congress wants to make a record this year for economy. Therefore we can have no public buildings bill.

Likewise it is reasonably certain that there will be no kind of legislation in behalf of labor. Some of their demands at least are meritorious and ought to be granted. For instance, the frequent and indiscriminate use and abuse of the injunction power by the Federal judiciary ought to be regulated and controlled and made so as to apply only to cases of violations of the law, and never used where it becomes the means of oppression and a menace to personal rights, individual liberty, and freedom.

The President has also asked that the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission be increased, to enable them more effectively to regulate and control railroad traffic, to correct existing abuses, and prevent, if possible, discriminations, not only in the matter of rates charged but also unreasonable and unjust delays in the handling of freight and furnishing cars; but this, like the rest, must wait two years more, or even longer, and the chances are good for a greater delay.

Finally, I presume that no man now believes that there is to be any currency legislation that will be of any benefit to the country. And after listening with much interest to the speech of the learned gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], who has just concluded his remarks, I have thoroughly reached the conclusion that, while the Senate may pass the Aldrich bill, the House will reject it. And should the House pass the Fowler bill, it will meet its defeat in the Senate. With this action I am not displeased, for I am convinced that both of these bills are in the sole interest of the national banks and would be of no benefit or advantage to anyone else. If these bills, especially the Fowler bill, should pass, it would be the sounding of the death knell to all State banks and would compel them to retire from business, leaving the national banks entirely in control of all the currency of the country, a condition not desired and earnestly hoped will never occur.

But whatever else may be said of the present agitation of the money question, at least some good has been the result of it. For instance, the entire country has been brought to a realization of the fact that we now have the worst currency system in the world, and we are fast beginning to realize that the sooner the present partnership and unholy alliance existing between the United States Government and the national banks is dissolved the better for everybody concerned, except the banks. Under existing law a national bank must own an interest-bearing Government bond before it can issue bank notes, but when it does own such a bond it has the right, and has had ever since the currency law of March 14, 1900, to issue the full amount of that bond in notes that circulate as money, and from the very moment of the issue of these notes the bank is placed in the advantageous position of drawing interest both ways or drawing double interest on the amount invested in the bond. First, it draws interest from the Government on the bond in a sum ranging from 2 to 4 per cent per annum, and, second, it draws interest from the people on the bank notes in a sum ranging from 8 to 10 per cent per annum; hence it is but natural that the banks should have a fondness for interest-bearing Government bonds and continue their desire to own them, as is shown by their increased holdings of the same from year to year. As evidence of this fact I shall here insert a letter and statement which I have only recently received from the Comptroller of the Currency, showing this phenomenal increase for the past four years. The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 25, 1908.

Hon. S. BRUNDIDGE, Jr., M. C.
House of Representatives.

SIR: Your letter of the 24th instant, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, is referred to this office. In compliance with the request therein the following information in connection with bonds on deposit by national banks to secure circulation is furnished:.

	February 28, 1905.	February 28, 1906.	February 28, 1907.	February 25, 1908.
2 per cent, 1930	$429,024,300	$499,104,000	$495,820,700	$563,818,850
3 per cent	2,527,540	1,958,240	4,398,020	9,797,020
4 per cent	10,236,300	10,784,200	35,709,150	16,675,750
P. O., 2 per cent			17,028,080	34,459,280
Certificates, 3 per cent				15,436,500
Total	441,788,140	511,846,440	552,955,950	640,187,400

Respectfully,

T. P. KANE,
Deputy Comptroller.

From this statement it will be seen that the banks have increased their holdings of bonds over $200,000,000 in the past four years, which is a most remarkable and rapid increase. The Government is now paying these banks annually; in interest alone, more than $16,000,000 as a bonus for the privilege of permitting them to issue currency to the full amount of the bonds. It will be remembered that only last fall the Secretary of the Treasury sold $15,000,000 of bonds bearing 3 per cent interest. These were sold only to the banks, and on these we pay them annually $450,000 in interest, while they were only required to pay into the United States Treasury 10 per cent of the purchase price. Ninety per cent thereof was very generously left in their own vaults.

These are not all of the advantages they enjoy. As often as they demand it the Government rushes to their aid with a deposit of untold millions of the public funds, which they hold without the payment of one cent of interest. They seem to understand that it is the province of the Government to pay interest, but not to receive it.

It is a strange coincidence that during a panic these financial institutions can and do, in violation of law, refuse to pay their depositors the money due them, and at the same time always have plenty of gold to buy all the bonds offered and complain because the amount sold is not larger.

When we recall the fact that a money stringency always produces a panic, and a panic always produces another bond issue and a further increase of the interest-bearing public debt, the only surprising thing about the whole business is that we do not have panics more often than we do.

If Congress would only repeal the law making these interest-bearings bonds the basis of securing this bank-note currency, it would go a long way toward settling the currency question and would remove the greatest temptation for creating a panic that has ever existed. The fact is that under present conditions there is every reason why the banks should pay the Government interest and not one valid reason for the Government paying interest to them.

Mr. Chairman, I want it understood that the failure to correct these evils and all the responsibility therefor rest alone with the Republican majority of this House. A majority of the Democrats would be glad to vote for them, but the other side are determined that we shall have no opportunity to do so, at least at this session. I believe in economy, and there should be no extravagant expenditure of the public funds; but under present conditions what is most needed just now is a liberal and broad-gauged Congress, for with more than $260,000,000 idle in the Treasury and several hundred thousand men and women idle throughout the country at the same time, we have a condition clearly showing that something is radically wrong. The truth is that just at this time the Government needs the labor and labor needs employment. Then, why not give it to them by making these long-needed interual improvements? If we should do so, the panic would be at an end at once; everybody who wanted employment could get it, and business would once again resume its natural and uninterrupted course.

For the last few days we have been frequently told by our Republican friends that the panic was over; that it had only lasted ninety days, and there was now no longer depression in the business world. But the facts do not justify these statements, and no man can blind himself to the fact that the great army of the unemployed is increasing daily. It was only a short time ago that more than a thousand men marching through the streets of Philadelphia were clubbed and beaten by the mounted police when their only offense was going to see his lordship the mayor to ask for employment.

The railroads everywhere are discharging their employees by the thousands and reducing the wages of those they retain. Only last week the cotton mills of the New England States made a reduction of 10 per cent from the wages of a hundred and sixty-five thousand employees. We have returned to the days of the soup house, and the charitable associations of every great city are now taxed to their utmost to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, and this deplorable condition could all be changed if Congress would only pass the legislation needed. Then, why do we not do it?

The best reason yet given for the failure to do so is that this is the election year, and we must go before the country with a record made for economy and show how much the majority has saved to the Treasury by its refusal to legislate. The people must be again faked by this old-time worn confidence game of deception which is attempted to be worked just before each national election. Can and will it again succeed? is the question that must be answered next November. I am inclined to believe that the people will not allow themselves to be fooled again, but will wake up to a full realization of the facts as they exist. When they do they will find a Republican majority in both the House and Senate halting and retarding every progressive step, and by so doing they are day by day swelling the ranks of the idle and unemployed. Who can calculate or even estimate the misery and suffering that will necessarily follow the pursuit of such a policy, and if it is to continue may we not expect the great army of voters to rise early in the morning of the next November election and hasten to the polls and there register with their ballots their solemn protest against a further lease of power to a party who withheld relief from the needy at a time when the Treasury was fairly bursting with useless money and thus demonstrated its incapacity to govern more than 80,000,000 of progressive and intelligent people? If the conditions remain as they are the next election will prove to be a great surprise unless a change speedily comes. When the sun goes down that evening behind the western horizon you need not be surprised to find that it has gilded with its golden rays one of the greatest victories the Democratic party has ever won. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. I should like to ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken or who may speak in general debate on this bill may extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Ohio that that can not be done in Committee of the Whole. It will have to be done in the House.

Mr. BOWERS. I yield thirty minutes, or so much thereof as he may require, to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the President's special message in connection with the trust question, with which it chiefly deals. I think all will agree that the President's recent message to Congress is the most forceful document that has yet emanated from the pen of that remarkable man in the White House. It is not my purpose to pass a general encomium upon it, as some have done, nor to criticise the motives of the President, as others have done. Conceding honesty of purpose to its author, I regard it and shall treat it as an able state paper, transmitted to Congress by the Chief Magistrate of the nation, reflecting his views upon grave questions of public concern which, in my judgment, call for the thoughtful and serious consideration of every member of this body, regardless of his party affiliations.

While I differ widely from the President as to the primary causes of the evils complained of, and also as to the means whereby these evils may be uprooted and destroyed, as I shall take occasion to point out in the course of my remarks, I certainly sacrifice none of my self-respect, or loyalty to my own party, when I say that I consider the aims of the President, as set forth in this message, highly commendable.

I heartily favor his recommendation for the passage of an employers' liability act. I indorse and approve the bold stand he has taken in this message for the enforcement of the law. I commend him for his demand for honesty in high financial transactions; for his denunciation of those engaged in dealing in futures and "stock-gambling" schemes, and for his earnest recommendations for further legislation to curb existing evils in the body politic.

On the contrary, there are a number of specific recommendations for new legislation contained in this and former messages of the President which do not meet with my approval.

I can not agree with the President in his recommendation for a national incorporation law. Such a law would be repugnant to both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, as that instrument has been interpreted for a hundred years, and would be subversive of the rights of the States. If under the new theory of constitutional interpretation advanced by Mr. Root, Secretary of State, such a law should be passed and upheld by the courts, it would prove a dangerous extension of Federal authority. It is not necessary to either destroy or stretch the Federal Constitution in order to suppress the trust evil. Ample power is lodged in Congress and in the legislatures of the several States, if rightly exercised, to wipe this monstrous evil from the entire domain of the United States. [Applause.]

I can not agree with the President in his recommendation to provide for a Federal license or tax for corporations engaged in interstate commerce. While there is probably no constitutional bar to such legislation, yet, in my judgment, the effect of it would be to perpetuate forever the trust evil in our industrial and commercial system.

Trusts, in the sense in which I shall use the term, are vast combinations of capital consolidated for the purpose of controlling prices or which in the conduct of their affairs operate in restraint of trade. All such combinations I regard as great evils. I do not possess that nice power of discrimination which permits me to follow the President in that delicate differentiation of thought which enables him to classify these great aggregations of capital, consolidated for purposes of monopoly, into good trusts and bad trusts. I regard all as bad. And that is the position of the Democratic party. Every corporation or combination of corporations enjoying a monopoly should have all its affairs subjected to the most rigid supervision, regulation, and control by law. If any such concern seeks to conduct its business and affairs in defiance of law, it should be destroyed. In no other way can the unoffending public be protected from the rapacity and greed of giant monopolies.

I can not agree with the President in his recommendation for an amendment to the Sherman antitrust law so as to enable the railroads, in certain cases, to enter into agreements and combinations now prohibited by law. This, in my opinion, would be a step in the wrong direction in our efforts to control and regulate the affairs of our great interstate railroads. This is based upon the fallacy aleady alluded to that we have good combinations and bad combinations. All combinations in restraint of trade are bad.

The chief value of the President's message, as I see it, consists not in the remedies proposed. Some of these are good, some are vague and uncertain, and others are of doubtful character, which, if enacted into law, might be far-reaching and dangerous in their tendencies. The chief value of the document is found in the fact that he, as President of the United States, in open defiance of large and powerful elements in his own party, grown arrogantly rich under and by virtue of existing conditions and laws, brings to the attention of Congress and the country in a forcible manner the chicanery, the frauds, the wrongful manipulations, and the dishonest transactions of high financiers in the management of great corporate concerns against the common rights of the whole American people.

Here I desire to call special attention to that portion of the President's message beginning with the paragraph on page 12, which is as follows:

The attacks by these great corporations on the Administration's actions have been given a wide circulation throughout the country, in the newspapers and otherwise, by those writers and speakers who, consciously or unconsciously, act as the representatives of predatory wealth—of the wealth accumulated on a giant scale by all forms of iniquity, ranging from the oppression of wageworkers to unfair and unwholesome methods of crushing out competition, and to defrauding the public by stock jobbing and the manipulation of securities. Certain wealthy men of this stamp, whose conduct should be abhorrent to every man of ordinarily decent conscience, and who commit the hideous wrong of teaching our young men that phenomenal business success must ordinarily be based on dishonesty, have during the last few months made it apparent that they have banded together to work for a reaction. Their endeavor is to overthrow and discredit all who honestly administer the law, to prevent any additional legislation which would check and restrain them, and to secure if possible a freedom from all restraint which will permit every unscrupulous wrongdoer to do what he wishes unchecked provided he has enough money.

Mr. Chairman, this is strong language indeed. Evil conditions are graphically described and forcefully portrayed. Wrongdoers in high places are fearlessly assailed and their business methods bitterly denounced by the Chief Executive of the nation. Yet the President has told us nothing new. The conditions described and the evils complained of by the President in this message were not unknown to the public. The Democrats, on the stump, through the press, in the halls of Congress, in their State platforms, and in their national platforms since 1896 have kept these conditions and evils constantly before the American people. They have pointed out and suggested numerous remedies therefor, some of which, I am glad to say, have found favor with the President. The subject of railroad-rate legislation affords an illustration in point. The demand for this character of legislation was embodied in the national Democratic platforms of 1896, 1900, and 1904.

The Democratic national platform of 1896 declares:

The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restrictions and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

The Democratic national platform of 1900 declares:

We favor such an enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect the individuals and communities from discriminations, and the public from unjust and unfair transportation rates.

The Democratic national platform of 1904 declares:

We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief for the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations, and monopolies, and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary to effectually suppress them.

No such demand is found in the Republican national platforms for any of those years; and, while it is true that individual Members on that side of the Chamber had previously introduced bills upon the subject, the first demand for this character of legislation coming from a high, authoritative Republican source is to be found in the President's annual message at the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, when he recommended the passage of the railroad rate bill. This one important measure has given President Roosevelt more popularity throughout the country than any other act of his Administration, and yet it was in keeping with specific demands of three successive Democratic national platforms. The act itself was passed in Congress by a practically unanimous vote in both Houses, Democrats and Republicans alike voting for it, with the exception of seven Republicans in the House and one Republican and two Democrats in the Senate, who voted against it. Hence the charge often made, not without foundation, that the President has profited in popularity by the absorption and appropriation of Democratic ideas and Democratic policies.

Mr. Chairman, there are three distinct and separate views upon the trust question. I hold in my hand a book entitled "The Raid on Prosperity," written by Chancellor Day, of Syracuse University, of New York. In this book Chancellor Day discredits the President and his Administration in his efforts for reform, and seeks to discredit reform movements from whatever source. He defends industrial combinations and their management in their entirety. He devotes three chapters to the Standard Oil Company; defends it and justifies all its methods. According to this learned publicist, the men in control of the great corporations and trusts are not malefactors, but the greatest benefactors of mankind. Present industrial conditions are ideal, and especially beneficial to laboring men. The evils from which we suffer are not due to these corporations or to the men at their heads, but are solely due to agitators, disturbers, and demagogues. This view is clearly set forth in an address delivered by Chancellor Day before a bankers' association at Albany, N. Y., on the 8th of last month, which was reported in the Washington Post, from which I clip the following extract:

The trouble has not been that our great geniuses of commerce and manufacture have become malefactors. The world has no nobler men. The trouble has been that the muck and slime of the vilifiers have been flung over them.

What of our future? If you will stop the ravings of the demagogues; if you serve vigorous notice on the men who are defaming our business men and discrediting our trade by representing our products as the sum of all villainy in fraud and adulteration; if you will call to account the men who are depreciating our bonds and stocks in foreign markets by comparing our great center of brokerage and exchange with a den of thieves; if you will insist that our great railways shall have fair play in their efforts to make new adjustments and to meet the demand of a fabulously developing country; if the whole people will rise up out of suspicion, distrust, and ignorance concerning economic conditions and insist that no man shall have their votes or their following who defames his country, sixty days will put an end to these hard times, and they will not return while we maintain our self-respect and insist that the rich and the poor shall live and work together in harmony under the guiding providence of that God who made them all.

BLOOD WILL FLOW.

But if you acquiesce and by silence consent to the infamous work of the scandal mongers and permit the widening of the chasm between our thrifty classes and the restless anarchistic Socialists; if you indifferently look on and utter no word of protest against an agitation that invites the anarchist to sharpen his dagger and that appeals to the poor to take the property of the rich with violence because it has been stolen from them; if you admit the justice and righteousness of these assaults upon the mighty forms of our finance, manufacture, and trade, and the estates of the successful in the development of our industries, I prophesy, as I did the panic more than a year ago from the same causes, that before another half decade blood will flow in our streets and the night rider's torch will light the heavens with its appalling glare.

Chancellor Day is an eminent man; he is at the head of a great institution of learning in the Empire State. He speaks not for himself alone, but for a class. By such utterances he reflects the views and sentiments of the greatly rich, with all their allied interests and with their tens of thousands of followers, beneficiaries, and sycophants. According to this view, all industrial combinations are good things and the men at their heads are all right.

The President in his message reflects the views of the reform element of his own party, of which he is the conspicuous head. According to this view, trusts may be classified into combinations that are beneficial and useful and combinations that are harmful; or, in other words, into good trusts and bad trusts. Those who entertain this view think that good combinations should be let alone and encouraged, but that something should be done to relieve the public from the oppression and wrongdoings of bad combinations. This view falls far short of the Democratic position upon the trust question. It is too narrow and circumscribed to comprehend within its scope some of the very worst forms of evil from which the American people are suffering to-day. It entirely ignores legalized frauds resulting from the operation of unjust and discriminatory laws. It also ignores evils that are inherent in and the natural outgrowth of every system of monopoly, entirely independent of the fact as to whether the men in control are well disposed or ill disposed. The Democratic party takes the broader and more comprehensive view of the subject than does the President and most of the reform members of his own party.

Now I desire to give you the Democratic view upon the trust question, not in my own words, but in the language of the last national Democratic platform:

TRUSTS AND UNLAWFUL COMBINES.

We recognize that the gigantic trusts and combinations designed to enable capital to secure more than its just share of the joint products of capital and labor, and which have been fostered and promoted under Republican rule, are a menace to beneficial competition and an obstacle to permanent business prosperity.

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law. We especially denounce rebates and discrimination by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade.

So much for conditions; so much for theories.

Now, let us turn to the consideration of practical remedies. In order that we may provide appropriate remedies for any evil, we should first analyze the same and ascertain the nature, character, and extent of such evil. Brushing aside the glow of inflammatory declamation and pyrotechnical denunciation and considering the question in the light of logic and cold facts, this analysis becomes exceedingly plain and simple. The conditions complained of in the President's message and the evils resulting therefrom may all be classed under one general head of "corporate abuses." These corporate abuses may be divided into three general classes, namely: Abuses resulting from law violations, abuses arising from absence of or lack of proper laws of restraint, and evils resulting from bad laws.

First. I desire to call your attention to abuses resulting from violations of existing laws by the directors, agents, and officers of corporations who control their management.

The remedy for this class of evils is to punish offenders for violations of the law. If the penalties now prescribed are not severe enough to restrain the wrongdoers, amend the law and fix heavier penalties. I have no objection to imposing a fine upon the corporation also. This, however, should not be used as a reason or excuse for allowing the guilty agents to go free. Nor have I one particle of sympathy with that sentiment that excuses the subordinate for the violation of law committed in obedience to the commands of his chief or some other high officer of the corporation. I think that every man, however humble his position, ought to be made to understand and know that the mandates of the law of the land are higher than the mandates of any corporation chief, however great his wealth or however powerful his influence. I therefore insist that every officer and agent of a corporation, be his position high or low, who willfully violates any of the provisions of existing law, should be made to suffer the penalties prescribed for such offense. A few conspicuous examples of rich men in the penitentiary or in the common prisons would do more to break up this species of evil than an hundred $29,000,000 fines imposed upon the corporations themselves. [Applause.]

Second. I desire to call your attention to corporate abuses arising from the absence of laws on the statute books to properly prohibit and restrain directors, officers, and agents of corporations from doing things which are unfair, unjust, and morally wrong, to the detriment of the public in the organization of and in the conduct and management of their corporate affairs.

The remedy for all such abuses is to enact new laws to prohibit and restrain the wrongdoing, to fix adequate penalties for their violation, and to rigidly enforce such laws against all offenders.

Third. I desire to call your attention to corporate abuses arising from the operation of bad laws, the effect of which is to foster and build up monopolies and trusts with all their attendant evils. In this class are all laws granting special franchises, subsidies, and gratuities to corporations; also all laws the effect of which in their operation is to give special privileges and law-made profits to certain classes, such as our high protective laws now in force.

The remedy for this last-named class of abuses is to repeal or modify the bad laws.

It is significant that this form of evil seems to have escaped the serious attention of the President. It is idle to rail at men as rich malefactors and yet maintain in full force and effect upon our statute books a system of unfair, unjust, and discriminatory laws that have made them rich and taught them to be malefactors. Blinded by their loyalty to a bad party policy—the policy of protection—neither the President nor any considerable number of his party associates seem to be able to look around behind the great protective tariff wall they have builded with their own hands and see where the trusts are coming from.

The fatal defect in the President's message and in the general policies of his Administration in dealing with the trust question is that he does not seem to comprehend the very close and beneficial relation between the high protective tariff and the trusts. The high protective tariff system is the very paladium of all the trusts. It is the strong redoubt behind which those classes grown rich and insolent by special privileges are strongly intrenched and securely protected. The remedy, in my judgment, which would be more effectual than all others in curbing the trusts lies within the clear scope of Congressional legislation. The remedy I refer to is the immediate revision and reduction of the high tariff schedules under the Dingley law. Under the operations of this law hundreds of industrial combinations have been formed, until almost every commodity of daily use is manufactured and sold by a trust.

Trusts are everywhere. The high tariff is the arm of the law that upholds and supports them. Paraphrasing a couplet from Burns—

Combines are like poppies spread,
You touch the tariff, and their bloom is shed.

The remedy for any evil, to be effective, must be applied to conditions and laws that have made possible the existence of such evil. In this case the evils complained of are the accumulation of vast and unlimited fortunes, great aggregations of capital, and a dangerous concentration of wealth in the hands of a few men, whom the President characterizes as "rich malefactors." This condition arises from two principal causes, already referred to, which bear a marked relation to each other. The one cause arises from laws upon our statute books, the effect of which is to grant special privileges to the manufacturing classes, and thereby enables them to augment their gains by arbitrary prices, resulting in large profits. Such is the effect of the high-protective schedules of the Dingley law. The other cause arises from the absence of laws upon our statute books to properly control and regulate the affairs of great corporate interests and their management. In other words, the one cause is the high protective tariff; the other is the unrestrained combination and consolidation of different corporate interests under one head, known as a trust. These twin sisters of iniquity walk arm in arm for the accomplishment of evil and evil continually.

The object and purpose of the one is to cut off foreign competition. The object and purpose of the other is to eleminate and destroy domestic or home competition. Unite the two for the one common purpose of destroying all competition, as they are to-day united in these United States, and you place the great toiling masses of the liberty-loving American people at the absolute mercy of a damnable coalition between legalized robbery and unrestrained greed. [Applause.]

Such is our exact condition to-day. The American people are ground down, as it were, between two millstones, and the wealth of the nation is rapidly, rapidly aggregating into the hands of a few. Who can gainsay it! The high tariff keeps out the foreigner; he no longer competes. The trust unites all concerns engaged in any one particular line of industry under one head or management, thus and thereby eliminating domestic or home competition, and in consequence thereof the America laborer, the American farmer, and all the great consuming classes of whatever vocation or calling are compelled to pay for every article of food or raiment of necessity or comfort the arbitrary and extortionate price fixed by the trust.

The Constitution guarantees free trade between the States. The trust annuls that provision of the Constitution, or renders it nugatory. We have in effect no free trade anywhere. The trust not only controls the wholesale price, but also fixes the retail price of goods sold by its customers, and enforces its mandates by a species of boycott.

Let me give you an illustration in point. The cotton-thread trust, or that concern which has gained control of all the spool cotton thread manufactured in the United States, last summer sent an agent to Bentonville, Ark., a town in my district of about 3,000 inhabitants, with many thriving merchants who have always competed with each other for business and for trade, to notify all these local merchants to raise the price of spool cotton thread to 6 cents per spool. Some of the merchants had been selling it at 5 cents per spool. One of the most prominent firms in town refused to comply with the demand, claiming the right to sell their goods at any price they saw proper to charge. The trust agent returned to the East, and in a few days this firm received a letter from the headquarters of the trust stating that unless they raised the price of spool cotton thread to 6 cents per spool no more spool cotton thread would be shipped to their firm. Feeling indignant at such treatment, this local firm replied that they had never purchased any goods from the firm making this unreasonable demand upon them; that they purchased all their spool cotton thread from a wholesale house doing business in their own town, and that they would continue to sell cotton thread to 5 cents per spool.

In a few days the wholesale house referred to received a communication from the agent of the trust forbidding them to sell any more spool cotton thread to this recalcitrant firm, and warning them that if they did so no more spool cotton thread would be shipped to the said wholesale house. Yet this is free America under the reign of the trusts.

But the evil does not stop there. Not content with destroying all forms of competition, these trusts dishonestly enhance their profits by degrading and cheapening the quality of every article and product manufactured and sold by them.

I received a letter just the other day from a constituent of mine, written at the request of his neighbors, calling my attention to certain frauds along this line, and appealing to me, as their Representative in Congress, to aid in the passage of some measure to give the people relief from such impositions. Hear his letter:

CHOCTAW, ARK., February 4, 1908.

J. C. FLOYD.

DEAR SIR: The good-food law is a good thing. I have been requested by a large number of old Democrats of this county to ask you to get up a bill to prohibit the false packing in shoes and harness. You know that if we false pack a bale of cotton or anything it is a heavy fine. We want pure shoes, pure harness, pure tobacco, pure flour, pure coffee. For the tin tags on tobacco we pay from 35 to 50 cents per pound, which is a fraud. We get shoes here with paper and felt soles; felt heels with one leather tap on them. This is the greatest expense that Arkansas has to contend with. Can Congress help us? Or will they do it?

W. J. COLVIN.

This is a humble petition. It was written neither for show nor for publication, and comes from a little settlement of farmers down in the mountains of Van Buren County, Ark., remote from railroads and the great centers of trade. These people are honest, hard-working people, and have their farms on a little stream known as the Choctaw; yet this letter sets forth simple and plain facts which show the low, mean, despicable methods to which these gigantic corporations resort in order to add millions to their already ill-gotten millions by frauds and impositions practiced upon the humble tillers of the soil. Can Congress help them? Or will they do it? What is the trouble? There are many avowed enemies of the trusts in the Republican party. Whenever we bring up this trust question our friends on the other side of the Chamber point with pride to the record of President Roosevelt and his vigorous fight against the trusts and trust methods. Yes; be it said to his credit, the President, breaking away from the stand-pat policies of his own party, has for seven years been waging a constant and sometimes bitter and acrimonious warfare against the trusts. Yet they have grown and multiplied.

And now the President tells us in this very message that they have recently banded together to work for a reaction; that they now seek to overthrow what has already been accomplished; to thwart further new legislation to curb and restrain them, and to bring about, if possible, a condition of affairs that will afford them absolute freedom from all restraint. The people of the United States appreciate the efforts of the President in his fight against the trusts; yet I think it may be truthfully said that never since Don Quixote had his celebrated encounter with the windmills has gallant knight, armed with sword and buckler, spurred and panoplied and plumed with all the equipage of glorious war, waged such persistent contest with such fruitless results. But let us deal fairly with the President. The fault is not altogether or chiefly with him. True, he has sometimes misapplied his blows. He has denounced men when he should have denounced men and systems. He has prosecuted corporations when he should have prosecuted corporations and men. The Standard Oil Company has been fined $29,000,000; the guilty agents of the corporation have been permitted to go free. The fine has not been paid and may never be paid, but if it is, what benefit comes to the public if the Standard Oil Company is permitted to recoup its losses by some other high stroke of finance that will bring to its coffers millions in excess of the fine? [Applause.]

I tell you that the principal source of these evils is in the system and in the condition of our laws rather than the result of wrongful acts of individual men. Rockefeller, Rogers, and Harriman will pass as all mortals must pass in this transitory world, but when these imperious Cæsars are dead and turned to clay others will rise up in their stead and do the same things that their fathers have done until we change and modify existing laws, until we make new laws to prohibit and restrain corporations from further acts of oppression, and until we make laws to suppress evils that are inherent in and the inevitable outgrowth of our present trust-controlled industrial and commercial systems.

The President in this and former messages has brought many matters to the attention of Congress and made many valuable recommendations which would prove beneficial if enacted into law.

The President has recommended an income-tax law. No effort has been made by the President's party to provide for an income tax by constitutional amendment or otherwise.

The President has recommended an inheritance tax. No effort has been made by the President's party to provide for an inheritance tax.

The President asked for an employer's liability act. He was given an unconstitutional measure.

The President asked for a railroad-rate law. He was given a railroad-rate law, but it has proven insufficient, and the President is now asking that the same be amended and strengthened in a number of particulars in order that the Interstate Commerce Commission may regulate more effectually our interstate railroads.

The President recommends that something be done to prohibit manipulations in stocks and stock-gambling schemes. Yet the leaders of the President's party seem to be doing nothing looking to the correction of these great evils.

Yet all the while the leaders of the President's party on the floor of this House have been loudly proclaiming that they indorse the President's policies. For neither the President nor anybody else claims that these are Republican policies. They are "his"—the President's policies. This thing has gone on until many people have been led to question the sincerity of the President himself in his advocacy of reform legislation. There are others who do not know what to think. They can not make up their minds as to whether he is a statesman and a genuine reformer or a politician of consummate skill, constantly fulminating his ideas of reform before Congress in brilliant messages, scintillating with the fire of patriotic fervor, as grand-stand plays before the American people. However that may be, it is true that very little has been accomplished; and very little will ever be accomplished without vigorous legislative action. We can not shift this great responsibility upon the President.

The responsibility is upon us as lawmakers. The remedy rests with the lawmaking power. The corporation is a creature of the law. A trust is a great corporation or a combination of corporations, and, hence, likewise a creature of the law. Neither the corporation nor the trusts have any inalienable rights. What the law creates the law can destroy, or can regulate, control, or restrain within limits. This should be done by the State if the corporation is acting within the exclusive jurisdiction or control of the State, and by the National Government if acting within the scope of Federal authority. If the lawmaking power in the State or in the National Government neglects or refuses to do its duty, the ultimate remedy rests with the people. In that event it is for the people to rise in revolt against their own leaders and hurl from power any party that favors or fosters legislative policies which operate to give special privileges to the rich against the poor. Yea, more! It is for the people to rise up in their sovereign might and strike down any man, regardless of party, who stands for legislation in favor of the classes as against the masses.

I have already submitted to you the Democratic position upon the trust question. I insist it is the only correct position, and must ultimately triumph. Fellow-Democrats, let us rally to the fight with renewed energy. The Republican party has utterly failed to deal successfully with the trust evil. This special message of the President is tantamount to a confession of that failure. The relief of the people from present bad conditions can only be secured through Democratic success. The war is on for industrial supremacy in this country, and the Republican party is closely allied with the trusts. The issue is sharply drawn between plutocracy on the one hand, and democracy, or the people, on the other. The insolence and oppressions of the greatly rich, and the disasters resulting from a widespread money panic, make conditions ripe for a change in the national Administration.

But let no one imagine that such a contest can be easily won. Those who would combat these forces of error with their millions of hoarded and ill-gotten gold, with their tens of millions of allies and hired emissaries, should have the zeal of martyrs and the courage of true patriots. This is no new fight. It is the old, old struggle of the ages. It is the struggle of the greatly rich seeking to gain and maintain privileges by law, or tolerated under the law, opposed and resisted by the masses constituting the great body of the people. The issue plainly stated is whether the combines and trusts shall control the Government or whether the Government shall control the combines and trusts.

In such a contest and on such an issue the Democratic party can and of right ought to win. It has ever been the enemy of plutocracy and special privileges. It has ever been the friend of the poor and oppressed. It has ever been the champion of equal rights and equal opportunities.

The prospects for Democratic success were never brighter. President Roosevelt has split the Republican party on the trust question, as President Cleveland during his second Administration split the Democratic party on the money question. All that we have to do in order to win is to unite all our forces and stand firmly and unalterably by the time-honored principles of Democracy, and millions of patriotic Americans, to whom these principles are ever dear, will rally to our support in this great civic conflict and will crown our efforts with a glorious victory. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOWERS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, the House being in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the annual appropriation for pensions, I desire to remonstrate and enter my protest on St. Patrick's day in the morning against existing laws governing the granting of pensions and the arbitrary and unjust rules and practices adopted by the Committees on Pensions.

It appears to me that the laws have been made to prevent, rather than give, pensions to that class of men who, by their heroism and bravery, made it possible for this nation to become the greatest of all nations.

No discretionary powers rest in the officials of the Pension Bureau. Technicalities are always in favor of the Government and against the poor soldiers, half of whom die trying to get that to which they are justly entitled.

All admit that every general law oftentimes works injustice. Pension laws should, however, be drafted out of a goodly mixture of gratitude, generosity, and justice.

Authority should be given the Commissioner of Pensions or a board of commissioners to pass upon all claims, according to the individual merit of each claim.

This authority rests in the hands of the Pension Committee. Likewise in the Invalid Pension Committee. But these committees have time to pass upon a few only of the many worthy and deserving bills introduced by the Members of Congress and referred to them.

If it is right, if it is just and fair for these committees to pass upon a few bills, why should not all of these bills be passed upon and accepted or rejected, according to the evidence and merit of the claimant?

During this session of the Sixtieth Congress in the neighborhood of 25,000 bills will be introduced in the House alone.

How many will be acted upon? Not so many likely as 2,000. What about those left in the pigeonhole?

Comrade Smith is helpless, blind, or partially so; perhaps paralyzed; possibly he has no property, no income except his pittance doled out by the Government.

A bill is introduced by his Congressman for his special relief. His bill happens to be one of the fortunate ones considered. By special act his pension is increased from $12 to $24, or even $30 per month; quite likely it should have been more. But it is an increase anyway, and his remaining days, but few at most, are made happier.

But how about Comrade Jones, who lives in the same town with Comrade Smith? He, too, is blind, helpless, no money, equally dependent and destitute.

His bill is not reached. He must continue to live on $12 per month or be carried to the county house. The Congressman is told that his case was not reached and he must wait until the next session.

Perhaps before Congress convenes again the old soldier, who, when his country called to him, left his home, his wife, his little ones, his aged mother, gave up pursuits full of promise to defend the flag and preserve the Union, dies.

He will not longer beg the Government to come to his relief, so sorely needed. He came to the relief of his country when the blood of the flower of our young manhood was so badly needed and so fearfully sacrificed, and dies unrewarded.

No; the old comrade's eyes are closed. After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.

He no longer clamors for or needs our aid and relief. A twenty-dollar headstone is generously set at the head of his grave. Possibly a flower is deposited on the little mound.

We close our eyes with satisfaction and boast of the splendid and generous care this great Government gives to its defenders.

Perhaps a century hence a costly monument may supplant the modest marker, a hothouse shelter the grave; but what does this avail the dead hero? A few dollars more each month while he was living would have meant far more than this tardy and unlimited expenditure after the final muster out. [Applause.]

No, Mr. Chairman, what we intend to do for the old soldiers ought to be done NOW.

We should not wait until all, or practically all, have answered the final summons. And they are fast dropping from the ranks, too, my colleagues. The gentleman from Ohio [General SHERWOOD], that valiant old soldier and statesman, told us the other day that 28,000 soldiers died last year; 80 every day; 1 every eighteen minutes. The old veterans will not be with us long.

And so I say that if one comrade is entitled to $24 or $30 per month by general or special act, then every other comrade in like circumstance and condition is entitled to $24 or $30 per month.

But how can this be done when one man must investigate and prepare the briefs on all of the bills referred to the Invalid Pension Committee? And one man to perform like service for the Pension Committee? It is simply out of the question.

I have no criticisms to make of Mr. Gauss, detailed by the Pension Bureau to examine the bills of the Invalid Pension Committee, or of Mr. Terry of the Pension Committee. In fact, I wonder how they go over the great mass of evidence and prepare as many bills for the committees as they do. I believe they are the hardest-worked Government employees in Washington to-day. At least three additional examiners should be detailed on the Invalid Pension Committee, that not only a few, but every bill, might be investigated and passed upon, to the end that every soldier would be treated exactly alike.

This is one of the conditions, Mr. Chairman, that I believe every Member will agree with me ought to be remedied. Fish should not be made of one and fowl of another.

As a new Member, I do not know how I can satisfactorily square myself with my soldier constituency. I have introduced forty-odd bills for special relief. I can not hope to get one-third of them passed. How about the others? Many will not be acted upon, equally as meritorious as those considered by the committee.

This is injustice to the Congressmen and injustice to the soldier. This, too, in a land where the Goddess of Justice stands blindfolded, that no distinction of the rights of any man, be he rich or be he poor, is supposed to be made. No wonder she stands blinded, for if sight were not obscured, she would weep big tears of shame that justice is so perverted.

The House has passed the widows' pension bill increasing from $8 per month to $12 per month the pensions of all widows who married soldiers prior to 1890.

Think of it. Eight dollars per month.

I received a letter yesterday, dated March 13, from a soldier's widow, Julia Dunaway, of Granville, Ohio, inquiring if it were true that Congress had passed a law increasing widows' pensions to $12 per month.

She says:

I am the mother of ten children. When my husband was living he got a pension of $100 per month and we got along very well. Now I get only $8 per month, and it is mighty hard to keep so many. I need all that I can get. Please tell me, is it true about our pensions?

Think of that, Mr. Chairman. A soldier's widow, the mother of ten children, drawing the munificent sum of $8 per month. This is an outrage. Any woman the mother of ten children whether she is a soldier's widow or not ought to get more than that. [Applause.]

The Senate wisely amended and passed this bill removing the marriage limitations. This is right; this is just. The wife who cares for her soldier husband during his last days, sure to be filled with suffering, nine chances out of ten a helpless invalid requiring untold care and attention, is entitled to a pension.

But the Senate did not go far enough. It makes this pension provision for widows of the wars up to and including the civil war only. Why exempt the Spanish war widows? This bill is now in the hands of a conference committee.

I hope this committee will still further amend the bill to include the widows and minor children of all wars.

I want to vote for this bill with such an amendment.

I want this House to pass the bill so amended. I believe the Senate will concur and I am sure the President will sign it.

I want a roll call had that every Member may go on record, that the friends of the heroes of this nation may be known and properly classified.

This, Mr. Chairman, brings me to a decidedly objectionable practice and rule.

I refer to the rules of the Pension Committee, to whom is referred all bills for special relief except those of the civil war.

This committee refuses to consider a Spanish war bill when the disabilities did not originate while in the service or can not be traced to such service.

This is an arbitrary and an unjust rule.

This rule does not prevail in the Invalid Pension Committee, I am glad to say.

The Pension Committee refuses to consider this class of claims and gives as a reason therefor that not until the act of 1890 were any pensions given to civil war veterans or veterans of other wars for disability without service origin.

This is strange precedent.

If it was right to pension a soldier in 1890 and since that time for disabilities other than of service origin, it was right to give such pensions before 1890.

If it is right to give civil war veterans such pensions, why not be fair to the Spanish war veterans?

I am told it is too soon; that the Spanish war veterans must wait because the veterans of other wars waited.

Because the veterans of wars previous to the Spanish war were not fairly and justly treated is that any reason why the rule should be continued and adhered to? Not in the least.

I ask indulgence for another personal reference to a case in my own district, the Seventeenth Ohio.

I refer to the claim of Herbert O. Kohr, of Uhrichsville, Ohio. He enlisted in Company B, First Batallion of Engineers, United States Army; served three years, reenlisted, and at the end of the second enlistment received an honorable discharge after six years of faithful service to his country. There is not a blot on his record.

Shortly after his discharge, while engaged on a public work at Oldwine, Iowa, a supposed dead dynamite fuse exploded. When his bleeding body was picked up, it was found that he had lost both eyes—not the sight only, but the eye balls were gone—one hand was off, and his face and body otherwise horribly disfigured; a wreck for life.

Before the accident he was a perfect picture of physical manhood. Now he is blind, helpless, penniless. A little lad leads this once stalwart soldier from house to house, from town to town.

He makes a precarious livelihood by selling a book that he has written since that accident. It is entitled "Around the World, or Six Years with Uncle Sam."

Yes; he was six years with Uncle Sam. Must he wait thirty years, if perchance he lives so long, to get a little something for six of the best years of his life?

He was in the battle of Santiago, he was in China during the Boxer uprising, and in the Philippines for many months. He risked his life and health, and for six long years was in arms, the greater portion of this time on the field of battle.

Now he is denied even a pittance from the Government he so faithfully and honestly defended. Why?

Because his disability did not originate in the service.

This is true. But for comparison let me refer to another case.

I know a veteran of another war who was in the service just ninety-one days. He was stricken with paralysis, and is now a Government beneficiary to the extent of $30 per month.

I am not opposed to pensions of the class to which I have referred. Not by any means. I doubt if any soldier ever got more than he deserved, and but few get as much.

I believe in pensions from the bottom of my heart.

I believe in pensions, first, because those who risked their lives in the defense of their country are entitled, in the days of their adversity, to the care and protection of the country they served so well. It is simple justice, not charity.

Second, because of the billion of dollars, or thereabouts, annually appropriated by the United States no part of it or all the rest of it does the country as much good as the one hundred and fifty millions distributed among the soldiers.

The merchant, the doctor, the editor, the preacher, and even the undertaker gets his share.

But to the claim of my poor blind Spanish war veteran. He is denied. He served six years, but because he happens to be a veteran of this war and not of some other war he must continue to live upon the charity of the public.

Six years ago Hon. John W. Cassingham, who then represented the district I to-day have the honor of representing, introduced a bill for the relief of Herbert O. Kohr. Two years ago my honorable predecessor, Judge M. L. Smyser, introduced a similar bill. The committee refused to consider these bills.

One of the first bills I introduced was for the relief of this poor, helpless, unfortunate man.

The chairman of the Pension Committee, the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER], he with the ever-present pink carnation in his coat lapel, fluffy cravat, and provoking twinkle in his eye, blandly but bluntly informed me that he would not permit the committee to recommend or consider this bill while he was chairman of the committee.

I interviewed many members of the Pension Committee. All agreed that this was a most worthy claim, but told me that I must get the consent of the chairman to consider the bill before a stone could be turned.

The poor soldier, who had worked his way to the Capitol, vainly appealed to be allowed to go before the committee, but he with pink complexion and enlarged heart still denied him.

I turned to the President of the United States. The blind soldier stood before the Chief Executive in mute silence. No lengthy appeal was necessary to enlist his sympathy and interest. A few simple words told the story of his life and service. The President realized the justness of the claim. President Roosevelt said Herbert O. Kohr ought to be pensioned, and that he would write the chairman of the Pension Committee and urge as strongly as he knew how a favorable consideration of this bill.

He did, and permit me to read the President's letter:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 31, 1908.

Hon. HENRY C. LOUDENSLAGER,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed letter from Congressman ASHBROOK explains itself. I have seen Herbert O. Kohr, the man for whom the pension is asked. He served for six years in the Regular Army, both in the Philippines and in China, with an honorable record. He then went into private life; was engaged in a public work at Oldwine, Iowa, and while engaged in duty a dynamite explosion caused him to lose both eyes, his left arm, and otherwise maimed him, so that he is absolutely helpless for life. He is dependent upon charity. If we had proper laws as to employers' liability, a man thus disfigured by a dynamite explosion would be pensioned for life anyhow. As we have no such proper laws, I earnestly hope that the Pension Committee will grant him a pension. I would do the same for any man who has served well in the Army of the United States and who afterwards while working hard for his living is disabled for life by an accident which, if our laws were proper, would also mean that he was pensioned for life. I very earnestly press his claim.

Sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

What has been done or what will be done? It looks like for the present the obdurate chairman would rule, notwithstanding the merits of the claim; notwithstanding President Roosevelt wrote the chairman of the committee, "I earnestly hope that the Pension Committee will grant him a pension."

Herbert O. Kohr is not only honestly entitled to a pension, but every other soldier with like record and unfortunate condition.

Does not the President say:

I would do the same for any man who has served well in the Army of the United States and who afterwards, while working hard for his living, is disabled for life by an accident which, if our laws were proper, would also mean that he was pensioned for life.

The President is right in his advocacy of an employers' liability law, and I hope to be able to vote for this law.

But, Mr. Chairman, such a law passed now or at any other time in the future would bring no relief to the already unfortunate victims of accident and disaster.

Every soldier of all the wars and their widows and dependent children ought to be fairly, justly, and liberally dealt with.

To my notion the greatest curse of Congress is the code of rules, both in the House and in the committees. I recognize the necessity of rules for the transaction of business and the control of all bodies. But rules should not deprive a Member and his constituency of their inherent rights, nor should it serve to defeat the ends of justice. [Applause.]

The veterans of the civil war will soon be gone, the last camp fire will be out. While they are living let this Government provide for them sufficient, at least, that they may be comfortably housed, clothed, and fed.

If to do this it is necessary to cut out the building of a battle ship or two each year, a few public buildings, or even reduce the standing Army, do so. [Applause.]

I voted last Saturday to increase the pay of city carriers of a certain grade from $1,100 to $1,200, because I believe many, very many, subordinate salaries are entirely too low, although I felt that the increase more justly belongs to other grades and the faithful rural carriers, who must keep a team and make long hauls over good roads and bad for $900 per annum; while his big city brother will hereafter get $1,200 for lighter work and shorter hours.

But why did Congress rush to the relief of these letter carriers and remain indifferent to such meritorious bills as the Sherwood dollar-a-day bill?

Is it because the old soldier is looked upon as having less political influence?

Nearly every Member was in his seat when the amendment to increase the salaries of the city letter carriers was being considered.

When the gentleman from Ohio [General SHERWOOD] ably argued for the passage of his bill three-fourths of the Members were conspicuous by their absence. I admit that seven Republicans were present and heard the old warrior plead for his comrades. [Applause on Democratic side.]

This is a poor way to inspire patriotism. It leads us to inquire, Does it pay to be a hero?

Don't turn these old veterans out to die like a worn-out horse.

Give those who, by their sacrifices and bravery, made this nation great, rich, and powerful their just reward.

Should the war clouds ever again threaten us, then will the young men follow the example of their patriotic fathers and forefathers and rally around the flag as of old.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I appeal again that our pension laws and rules of the Pension Committees be so amended that all may secure and receive without further unnecessary delay that which is justly due them.

May the policy of a square deal be practiced as earnestly and as strongly as it is to-day preached. In conclusion I use the words of the President, "I earnestly press their claims." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the bill that I have introduced (H. R. 18790) provides for prohibition of immigration to the United States of Japanese and Korean laborers. Before offering any reason for the passage of the bill I desire to outline briefly the salient features of the measure. After that I shall offer a few words showing why the bill should become a law.

In preparing the bill I have followed as closely as practicable the wording of the Chinese-exclusion act and the amendments thereto. I have done this in order, if possible, to use language that has been interpreted by the Department of Commerce and Labor and by our courts. One section of the Chinese-exclusion act, providing for the imprisonment for one year of a Chinaman unlawfully within the United States prior to deporting him, I have omitted, because it was held by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. Several sections in the original Chinese-exclusion act have been omitted because the matters which they cover have been dealt with more satisfactorily in later amendments. The main features of the bill are as follows:

First. The prohibition of the immigration of Japanese and Korean laborers into the United States or the insular possessions of the United States, or from the insular possessions to the main land.

Second. The prohibition of any Japanese or Korean laborer returning to the United States who had departed, unless he had a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. These provisions have been so safeguarded as to preclude abuses thereunder.

Third. It is provided that all Japanese and Korean laborers who may be entitled to remain in the United States at the time of passage of the act shall, within six months thereafter, obtain certificates of residence. This is the same provision that was required of Chinese laborers, and is plainly necessary in order that the spirit of the act may not be avoided.

Fourth. Provision is made in the bill for access to our country of Japanese and Korean merchants, professional men, students, and travelers, besides diplomatic representatives.

It will appear then that the object of the measure is to exclude from our country the great body of Japanese and Korean laborers to whom our doors are open so far as laws are concerned and to place these laborers and their families in the same class as the Chinese laborers. The purpose of the bill is to prevent a large oriental population coming to our shores and becoming a part of the population of the United States, and while the bill does not seek to limit the immigration of Japanese and Koreans absolutely, it does seek to limit the immigration of practically the entire number who are coming to our shores at the present time.

Nations are organized and perpetuated for the benefit of the people who make up the nation, and as people individually have problems to solve that have to do with their course of life, so nations have problems to solve which bear upon their perpetual well-being, and we must proudly assume that our nation's life is perpetual. Many acts of a nation are merely transitory and have but a passing effect upon the current events and development of the nation; other policies of the nation go to the very basic principles upon which the nation rests.

A tariff law operates indifferently and may be repealed or continued with slight effect upon the ultimate character of the nation; a financial policy may be changed by each succeeding administration; great Government improvements have to do with the facility with which business is handled, but not one of these questions strikes vitally at the highest good of any country. The question involved with respect to the immigration of people to our shores has to do with the character of our population, of our institutions, of our religious, ethical, social, and political life. Our country is going through a great formative period, and it is the duty of our nation to have a guard for not only our commercial and industrial well-being, but our people as well. More important than the construction of railways, the building of cities, or the reclamation of arid lands is the safeguarding of our population, and in safeguarding our population one of the primal things to which our minds must be directed is the blood that flows in our people's veins. Peoples of different color and widely separated racial tendencies do not live side by side under the same flag in peace and harmony.

It matters not the relative development of the races; it matters not that they are equal in all that makes for highest manhood and for purest womanhood; it matters only that their social characteristics are separated by a chasm so deep that it can not be bridged at the marriage altar, and their folklore stories mingled by a common fireside. Such is the chasm that separates the American people to-day from the people of the Orient. It is upon this ground that I believe they should be excluded from our shores in such a manner as will prevent any considerable number from ever claiming this their home. This can be done, I believe, by the exclusion of the laboring classes of the oriental countries. On the other hand, realizing the vigor, attainments, and traditions of these ancient people, realizing that they have broken the spell that has bound them as recluse nations during the centuries gone by, we may well afford to admit their scholars that we may learn from them, their students that they may learn from us, their merchants, if this can be done without abuse, that we may buy from them the product of their genius, and through whom we may in turn exploit the fruits of our own industrial thrift.

The relations between the United States and the nations of the Orient should be such that the utmost good will may prevail. We should ask nothing from them that we would not as cheerfully concede. As the years go by we will become more and more interdependent. Notwithstanding this, our growth should be side by side and not by mingling the population of America on the continent of Asia and the population of Asia upon the continent of America. It may be laid down as a cardinal principle that the greatest internal peace belongs to that nation whose people are homogeneous, while, on the other hand, distrust, unrest, and internal strife are the undoubted portion of the nation whose people do not blend.

Prior to the discovery of gold in California, following a policy of exclusiveness centuries old, the people of China, Japan, and Korea had hardly set foot upon our shores. Within four years after 1849 10,000 Chinese alone had landed in the United States, and by 1882, when the first definite act was passed restricting the immigration of Chinese laborers into our country, more than 100,000 Chinese and Japanese had found their way hither. At that time Congress listened to the voice of the West, and an act was passed suspending the immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States. We have followed the policy of excluding Chinese laborers ever since.

Notwithstanding the vigilance that we have exercised, and in view of liberal immigration laws as relate to Japan and Korea, there are to-day something like 300,000 people from China, Japan, and Korea in our midst, and if ready immigration were possible this number would multiply itself many times within the next few years. The tendency of the last quarter of a century warrants me in making this assertion. Going back no further than 1893 and following the immigration of Japanese into our country up to the present, the figures from the report of the Commissioner of Immigration of the United States are very striking:

Japanese immigrants.

1895	1,150
1896	1,110
1897	1,526
1898	2,230
1899	2,844
1900	12,635
1902	14,270
1903	19,968
1905	10,331

The most casual examination of these figures warrants the belief that the tendency is firmly established, and I believe that only by legislation on our part can further immigration be withstood. Remarkable as are the figures bearing upon the immigration of Japanese to our country, I do not think that they represent the true increase. Thousands of Japanese have doubtless come to our country of whose entrance no record has been made. They have come from Canada and Mexico. It has been estimated that the number of Japanese who have entered in this manner for many years equals the number who were admitted through the custom-house. Upon this question the Commissioner-General of Immigration of the United States says in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907:

> Japanese laborers in large numbers are, and have been for months, flocking to both Canada and Mexico. That in the vast majority of cases their intention (usually formed, it is believed, before embarking for the voyage over) is to enter the United States the Bureau is convinced. In other words, these laborers merely use foreign contiguous territory as a place of temporary sojourn while perfecting plans for proceeding to points in this country. Reports received from immigration officials located in Canada and along the Mexican border show beyond question that such is the case.

I find also in the report that Inspector Braun made to the Immigration Department under date of February 12, 1907, this remarkable statement in confirmation of the remarks which I have just made:

> I have stated before that to secure reliable data as to the number of immigrants coming into Mexico is very difficult, if it be not an impossibility, but I have been assured that during the last year and a half 8,000 Japanese and 5,000 Chinese have entered the Mexican Republic. To-day, however, there are not 2,000 Japanese and not 15,000 Chinese in all Mexico, although, according to a conservative estimate, more than 45,000 Chinese have come to Mexico, and few ever return from there. The Mexican-Chinese-Japanese transportation companies—steamers from all the Mexican ports—have not taken them home to the Orient. Where are the Japanese and Chinese that have come to Mexico and did not remain in that Republic? The almost irresistible conclusion is they found their way to the United States.

I believe that if a census could be taken to-day of the Japanese within our country the number would equal something like 175,000 people. The tendency among the Koreans is just the same. They have not come to our country in such large numbers as have the Japanese, but I believe a very conservative estimate would place their number at 15,000, and that most of these were admitted since the census of 1900.

The relative proportion of this oriental population when compared with the population of our own country is comparatively small, yet, in spite of this, resentment is felt toward them very generally by the sections of our country that have any considerable number of Asiatic people. This resentment is deep rooted and is not the passing sentiment of a restless day. The immigrants from Japan and from Korea, as well as most of the Chinese who came to our country prior to the passage of the Chinese-exclusion law, look upon our country as a place which will furnish men with immediate work at good wages, and probably with some remote or uncertain idea of making this their home. The immigrant from the Orient has lived in a country where he has received something like 10 or 15 cents per day for his labor. He is willing to work in the United States, and he is willing to accept for his labor the minimum wages paid to a white laborer, and even less. Certain handicaps that exist compel him to do this. He does not know our language; he is not as skillful at first as our own laborers. He is not supplied with a large amount of money and is compelled to earn the means for his subsistence.

The result is apparent. He establishes a scale of wages that he can with difficulty raise after he does know our language and after he has become proficient. He establishes a scale of wages far lower than the wages paid to white laborers for doing the same work. The Japanese and Korean Exclusion League, from estimates based upon the wages received by thousands of laborers in the city of San Francisco, does not hesitate to say that the wages which the Japanese receive are from 40 to 50 per cent lower than the wages received by white laborers doing the same character of work.

This is not the only way the presence of the oriental laborer is detrimental to the interest of the white workman. For years the American laborer has struggled for a shorter labor day. He has desired more time away from daily routine for himself or for his family. He has so far succeeded that the eight-hour day is becoming more and more universally recognized. From statistics prepared by the Japanese and Korean Exclusion League, covering thousands of Japanese workmen, it is shown that the Japanese laborer works from ten to fourteen hours per day, where the white laborer works about nine hours. No one can successfully maintain that such competition as this does not tend to lower the conditions of the white laborer.

The white laborer is not accustomed to living as the coolie laborer of the Orient lives. He demands better food and better homes. A single room will furnish all there is of home for six or eight or ten Japanese, Chinese, or Korean laborers, and this same squalid quarters would not be considered as worthy by the most modest American workman. Living in such quarters, working longer hours for lower wages, the coolie laborer is a menace to the great body of American workingmen and a great menace to the best interest of our entire people.

It has been urged that the coolie laborer does the work that the American laborer will not do. Yet such is not the case. The bright Japanese has entered the lists against workmen in almost every line of labor. There are tailors and there are printers; there are engineers and machinists. There are miners, clerks, shoemakers, barbers, jewelers, office boys, hotel and restaurant keepers, photographers, section hands, carpenters, painters, bricklayers, paperhangers, plasterers, gardeners and farmers, and scores and scores of other workmen who are Japanese, and they are in our own country and competing with our own labor.

It is no wonder, then, that the American laborer, no matter whether he is skilled or unskilled, looks upon the tremendous immigration from the Orient as constituting a grave danger to American ideals and American opportunities, not only for the present but for all time. If a halt is not called, what will be the condition within a few years of every trade throughout the West? What will be the condition of the laboring man, whether skilled or unskilled? If the workmen of the Orient are entering these various lines of work to-day, surely they will enter, by another short decade, the lists as competitors with our own workmen in tenfold degree.

I fully realize that what I have said will be met with counter argument by many people in our country, and especially throughout the East. There are those who urge most vigorously that any restriction is wrong. They urge that we should encourage the immigration of Japanese. They believe that we need the labor of these people. The latter part of January of this year a splendid body of representative men—the National Board of Trade—convened in our nation's capital. That body of able men adopted on January 22 a resolution upon this question, which I desire to call to your attention:

> Resolved, That the National Board of Trade is strongly opposed to any and all legislation intended to discriminate against Japan or her citizens; but, on the contrary, it is believed that every effort should be made to cultivate and promote the most intimate commercial relations between the two countries, and that all privileges now enjoyed by the most favored nations should continue to be extended to the Japanese.

This resolution would not have been adopted had the spirit of the resolution not been approved by a considerable number of business interests or of citizens of our country. The men who approved it, I fully believe, have looked upon but one side of the question. They have seen great opportunities for the unfolding of our industries. They have seen demand for labor. They have seen the need of men for railroad, mine, and factory.

But in their enthusiasm they have not seen the impoverished condition that inevitably would be brought to American labor within the quarter of a century already begun if their resolution were to be given life during the next twenty-five years. They have not seen that a race of people would be placed side by side with our own people, which would arouse enmity and passion and bring about internal strife and perhaps open war because of their unwelcome presence. They have seen quick action and immediate results; but they have not seen the suffering that they would entail upon two races contending each for higher social and political advantages as the years roll on into the countless decades of our glorious Republic.

The condition of a few to whom wealth has been granted bears little relation to the welfare of any nation. Our nation can not be higher than the general condition of the masses of our people. If the masses of our people are prosperous, our country is prosperous. If they are not prosperous, if they are not content, then in that degree does our Government fall short of the great responsibility that the people have reposed in our political institutions.

The time to solve this question is now; not next year, nor two years from to-day, but now. Every day that passes without action being taken the problem becomes more difficult. Every day will witness greater opposition to this legislation upon the part of interests that will be affected. Steamship companies will oppose this legislation with each succeeding day, because they will desire the traffic in the bringing of oriental people to our shores. Every year that passes without this legislation will make it increasingly more difficult to maintain cordial relations with our neighbors across the sea.

Every year that passes will bring additionally embarrassing political questions to the States which have oriental voters. It is not to be supposed that these voters could get the point of view that the American would have. It is not to be supposed that they would fail to use their ballot to produce practical results for themselves. Every year that passes will bring increased difficulties because of the public school situation. Every year will heighten the difference between the oriental laborer and the white laborer, and the white laborer can not be blamed for standing for the welfare of his own fireside. Last of all, every year that goes by without positive legislation looking to the checking of oriental immigration means the introduction into our midst of a people of a strange blood who throughout the centuries to come will retain their individuality and serve as the slumbering embers that will in the sometime burst into flames of international wars involving our own country and the nations of the Orient.

We may talk of friendly understanding and the willingness of the oriental nations to prevent the immigration of their people to our shores. I respect the sincerity of those who urge this course, but I have no confidence in the merits of such a policy. We can not leave this question to Japan and to Korea any more than thirty years ago we could have left the question of Chinese immigration to the Chinese Government. The present ministry may favor the policy, the succeeding one may oppose it, or if it favors it, the ministry may not prove itself efficient. During the last few days the people of Japan, by their votes, have asked for a new ministry. Who can tell the policy of the political leaders who will now assume control? Aye, if they have declared their policy, who can tell how faithfully that policy will be executed or what will be the policy in ten years from now?

Within the last two years the people of the West have been restless on this question. This restlessness has not been confined to the people of the United States; it has extended to Canada. Since Congress has been assembled the dispatches in our papers have told of this unrest from day to day. The very day the resolution was passed in our capital city by the National Board of Trade, favoring the immigration of Japanese, a representative of the parliament of British Columbia is reported as having declared that the Japanese of Vancouver were thoroughly armed, and that if steps were not taken to disarm them the citizens would arm themselves. This is but a straw, but it indicates the direction of the wind. Within the last two years the American people have witnessed a struggle that has gone on in San Francisco between the citizens and school authorities, on the one side, and the Japanese, on the other, over the question as to whether or not the Japanese should attend the public schools side by side in the same rooms, in the same classes, with our own boys and girls.

Within the year we have heard forecasts of war between our country and the Empire of Japan. Within the year we have seen 10,000 laborers in Vancouver, in British Columbia, descend upon the Japanese and Chinese quarters of that city, break in the doors and windows of fifty houses, and injure some of those who would defend. Within the year we have seen repeated instances of lesser violence, and local officers, for the maintenance of the peace, have been called upon more than once to protect our own people or the ones whose presence they resent.

These things are probably not great within themselves, but I speak of them for what they signify. The time has come when the Chinese or Japanese on the Pacific coast is not pointed out as the curious representative of an unknown race—a mere object of interest. That time has long passed by. The time has come when his presence excites resentment. The hand of the brown man is raised against the hand of the white. He lowers wages. He lowers the standard of living. In times of prosperity he awakens angry passions. In times of depression he arouses riots. Law-abiding for the most part, he has no love for any country but his own. He does not harmonize with our institutions. His blood could not be assimilated with our own because of race prejudice, nor would it be desirable were assimilation possible.

Why, then, should we give ear to any voice that pleads for the admission of these people to our shores? To admit them is to sow the seeds of violence and bloodshed for years to come. It may not be in our day, but it will be some time. Now, while it is within our power, we should work out a course that will mean peace for the present day and peace for the future years. Now, while this voice is heard asking leniency in our laws; now, while commercialism is asking for oriental labor; now, I say, is the time for our country to arouse herself from all lethargy and to say to all the world that for the advantage of a day we shall not bring a curse upon our land; we shall not sell our birthright for a mess of pottage. Our country has no spirit of hostility against Korea, China, or Japan. Our country has only highest hopes for those old peoples. We are proud of their intellect; we admire their love of native land; we glory in the success that the last century has brought to them. We deny them nothing that we are not willing that they should deny us. We wish them untold blessings through future years; but we want their unfolding to be on their own land. Loyal to American institutions, loyal to American labor, loyal to American blood, our country should sound a warning to the American people, to the Chinese and Japanese alike, that, however close our commercial relations may be, each race should leave the other free, under the guidance of almighty God, to work out its own great destiny.

I append herewith a copy of my bill, which is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18790) prohibiting the immigration of Japanese and Korean laborers to the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the coming of Japanese and Korean laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, prohibited; and it shall not be lawful for any Japanese or Korean laborer to come from any foreign port or place to any State or Territory or insular possession of the United States nor from any insular possession to the mainland of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States or from any insular possession to the mainland of the United States on such vessel and land, or attempt to land, or permit to be landed any Japanese or Korean laborer from any foreign port or place shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 for each and every such Japanese or Korean laborer so brought, and may also be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

SEC. 3. That the two foregoing sections shall not apply to Japanese and Korean laborers who were in the United States on the passage of this act who shall produce to such master before going on board such vessel, and shall produce to the collector of the port in the United States at which such vessel shall arrive, the evidence hereinafter in this act required of his being one of the laborers in this section mentioned; nor shall the two foregoing sections apply to the case of any master whose vessel, being bound to a port not within the United States, shall come within the jurisdiction of the United States by reason of being in distress or in stress of weather, or touching at any port of the United States on its voyage to any foreign port or place: Provided, That all Japanese or Korean laborers brought on such vessel shall not be permitted to land except in case of absolute necessity, and must depart with the vessel on leaving port.

SEC. 4. That from and after the passage of this act no Japanese or Korean laborer in the United States shall be permitted, after having left, to return thereto, except under the conditions herewith enumerated:

No Japanese or Korean laborer within the purview of this section shall be permitted to return to the United States unless he has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement.

The marriage to such wife must have taken place at least a year prior to the application of the laborer for a permit to return to the United States and must have been followed by the continuous cohabitation of the parties as man and wife.

If the right to return be claimed on the ground of property or of debts, it must appear that the property is bona fide and not colorably acquired for the purpose of evading this act, or that the debts are unascertained and unsettled and not promissory notes or other similar acknowledgments of ascertained liability.

A Japanese or Korean person claiming the right to be permitted to leave the United States and return thereto on any of the grounds stated in this section shall apply to the Chinese, Japanese, and Korean inspector in charge of the district from which he wishes to depart at least a month prior to the time of his departure, and shall make on oath before the said inspector a full statement descriptive of his family, or property, or debts, as the case may be, and shall furnish to said inspector such proofs of the facts entitling him to return as shall be required by the rules and regulations prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and for any false swearing in relation thereto he shall incur the penalties of perjury.

He shall also permit the Chinese, Japanese, and Korean inspector in charge to take a full description of his person, which description the collector shall retain and mark with a number.

And if the said inspector, after hearing the proofs and investigating all the circumstances of the case, shall decide to issue a certificate of return, he shall, at such time and place as he may designate, sign and give to the person applying a certificate containing the number of the description last aforesaid, which shall be the sole evidence given to such person of his right to return.

If this last-named certificate be transferred, it shall become void, and the person to whom it was given shall forfeit his right to return to the United States.

The right to return under the said certificate shall be limited to one year; but it may be extended for an additional period, not to exceed a year, in cases where, by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, the holder thereof shall be rendered unable sooner to return, which facts shall be fully reported to and investigated by the consular representative of the United States at the port or place from which such laborer departs for the United States, and certified by such representative of the United States to the satisfaction of the Chinese, Japanese, and Korean inspector in charge at the port where such Japanese or Korean person shall seek to land in the United States, such certificate to be delivered by said representative to the master of the vessel on which he departs for the United States.

And no Japanese or Korean laborer shall be permitted to reenter the United States without producing to the proper officer in charge at the port of such entry the return certificate herein required. A Japanese or Korean laborer possessing a certificate under this section shall be admitted to the United States only at the port from which he departed therefrom, and no Japanese or Korean person, except Japanese or Korean diplomatic or consular officers, and their attendants, shall be permitted to enter the United States except at the ports of San Francisco, Portland (Oreg.), Boston, New York, New Orleans, Port Townsend, or such other ports as may be designated by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to prescribe the form and substance of certificates to be issued to Japanese or Korean laborers under and in pursuance of the provisions of this act, and prescribe the form of the record of such certificate and of the proceedings for issuing the same, and he may require the deposit, as a part of such record, of the photograph of the party to whom any such certificate shall be issued.

Any person who shall knowingly and falsely alter or substitute any name for the name written in any certificate herein required, or forge such certificate, or knowingly utter any forged or fraudulent certificate, or falsely personate any person named in any such certificate, and any person other than the one to whom a certificate was issued who shall falsely present any such certificate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term of not more than five years.

SEC. 6. That in order to secure the faithful execution of the provisions of this act every Japanese or Korean person, other than a laborer, who may be entitled to come within the United States, and who shall be about to come to the United States, shall obtain the permission of and be identified as so entitled by the Japanese or Korean Government, or of such other foreign government of which at the time such Japanese or Korean person shall be a subject, in each case to be evidenced by a certificate issued by such government, which certificate shall be in the English language, and shall show such permission, with the name of the permitted person in his or her proper signature, and which certificate shall state the individual, family, and tribal name in full, title, or official rank, if any, the age, height, and all physical peculiarities, former and present occupation or profession, when and where and how long pursued, and place of residence of the person to whom the certificate is issued, and that such person is entitled by this act to come within the United States.

If the person so applying for a certificate shall be a merchant, said certificate shall, in addition to above requirements, state the nature, character, and estimated value of the business carried on by him prior to and at the time of his application as aforesaid: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as embracing within the meaning of the word "merchant" hucksters, peddlers, or those engaged in taking, drying, or otherwise preserving shell or other fish for home consumption or exportation.

If the certificate be sought for the purpose of travel for curiosity, it shall also state whether the applicant intends to pass through or travel within the United States, together with his financial standing in the country from which such certificate is desired.

The certificate provided for in this act and the identity of the person named therein shall, before such person goes on board any vessel to proceed to the United States, be viséed by the indorsement of the diplomatic representatives of the United States in the foreign country from which such certificate issues or of the consular representative of the United States at the port or place from which the person named in the certificate is about to depart; and such diplomatic representative or consular representative whose indorsement is so required is hereby empowered, and it shall be his duty, before indorsing such certificate as aforesaid, to examine into the truth of the statements set forth in said certificate, and if he shall find upon examination that said or any of the statements therein contained are untrue it shall be his duty to refuse to indorse the same.

Such certificate viséed as aforesaid shall be prima facie evidence of the facts set forth therein, and shall be produced to the Chinese, Japanese, and Korean inspector in charge of the port in the district in the United States at which the person named therein shall arrive, and afterwards produced to the proper authorities of the United States whenever lawfully demanded, and shall be the sole evidence permissible on the part of the person so producing the same to establish a right of entry into the United States; but said certificate may be controverted and the facts therein stated disproved by the United States authorities.

SEC. 7. That the master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place shall, at the same time he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and if there be no cargo, then at the time of making a report of the entry of the vessel pursuant to law, in addition to the other matter required to be reported, and before landing, or permitting to land, any Japanese or Korean passengers, deliver and report to the Chinese, Japanese, and Korean inspector in charge of the district in which such vessel shall have arrived a separate list of all Japanese or Korean passengers taken on board of his vessel at any foreign port or place, and all such passengers on board the vessel at that time. Such list shall show the names of such passengers (and if accredited officers of the Japanese or Korean or of any other foreign government traveling on the business of that government, or their servants, with a note of such facts), and the names and other particulars as shown by their respective certificates; and such list shall be sworn to by the master in the manner required by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo.

Any refusal or willful neglect of any such master to comply with the provisions of this section shall incur the same penalties and forfeiture as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo.

SEC. 8. That before any Japanese or Korean passengers are landed from any such vessel the Chinese, Japanese, and Korean inspector in charge, or his deputy, shall proceed to examine such passengers, comparing the certificates with the list and with the passengers, and no passenger shall be allowed to land in the United States from such vessel in violation of law.

SEC. 9. That every vessel whose master shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to seizure and condemnation in any district of the United States into which such vessel may enter or in which she may be found.

SEC. 10. That any person who shall knowingly bring into or cause to be brought into the United States by land, or who shall aid or abet the same, or aid or abet the landing in the United States from any vessel, of any Japanese or Korean person not lawfully entitled to enter the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

SEC. 11. That any Japanese or Korean person or person of Japanese or Korean descent, when convicted and adjudged under any of said laws to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, shall be removed from the United States to Japan in the case of a Japanese, and to Korea in case of a Korean, unless he or they shall make it appear to the justice, judge, or commissioner before whom he or they are tried that he or they are subjects or citizens of some other country, in which case he or they shall be removed from the United States to such country: Provided, That in any case where such other country of which such person shall claim to be a citizen or subject shall demand any tax as a condition of the removal of such person to that country, he or she shall be removed to Japan or Korea as specified heretofore in this paragraph.

Any Japanese or Korean person or person of Japanese or Korean descent arrested under the provisions of this act shall be adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States unless such person shall establish, by affirmative proof, to the satisfaction of such justice, judge, or commissioner his lawful right to remain in the United States.

But any such Japanese or Korean person convicted before a commissioner of a United States court may, within ten days from such conviction, appeal to the judge of the district court for the district.

A certified copy of the judgment shall be the process upon which said removal shall be made, and it may be executed by the marshal of the district or any officer having authority of a marshal under the provisions of this section.

And in all such cases the person who brought or aided in bringing such person into the United States shall be liable to the Government of the United States for all necessary expenses incurred in such investigation and removal; and all peace officers of the several States and Territories of the United States are hereby invested with the same authority in reference to carrying out the provisions of this act as a marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, and shall be entitled to like compensation, to be audited and paid by the same officers.

After the passage of this act, on an application to any judge or court of the United States in the first instance for a writ of habeas corpus by a Japanese or Korean person seeking to land in the United States to whom that privilege has been denied, no bail shall be allowed, and such application shall be heard and determined promptly without unnecessary delay.

SEC. 12. That it shall be the duty of all Japanese or Korean laborers within the limits of the United States who were entitled to remain in the United States before the passage of this act to apply to the collector of internal revenue of their respective districts within six months after the passage of this act for a certificate of residence; and any Japanese or Korean laborer within the limits of the United States who shall neglect, fail, or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act, or who, after the expiration of said six months, shall be found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence, shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States and may be arrested by any United States customs official, collector of internal revenue or his deputies, United States marshal or his deputies, and taken before a United States judge, whose duty it shall be to order that he be deported from the United States, as provided in this act, unless he shall establish clearly to the satisfaction of said judge that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause he has been unable to procure his certificate, and to the satisfaction of said United States judge, and by at least one credible witness other than Japanese or Korean, that he was a resident of the United States on the date of the passage of this act, and if, upon the hearing it shall appear that he is so entitled to a certificate, it shall be granted upon his paying the cost.

Should it appear that said Japanese or Korean had procured a certificate which has been lost or destroyed, he shall be detained and judgment suspended a reasonable time to enable him to procure a duplicate from the officer granting it, and in such cases the cost of said arrest and trial shall be in the discretion of the court; and any Japanese or Korean person, other than a Japanese or Korean laborer, having a right to be and remain in the United States, desiring such certificate as evidence of such right, may apply for and receive the same without charge. No person heretofore convicted in any court of the States or Territories or of the United States of a felony shall be permitted to register under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 13. That immediately after the passage of this act the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the efficient execution of this act, and shall prescribe the necessary forms and furnish the necessary blanks to enable collectors of internal revenue to issue the certificates required hereby, and make such provisions that certificates may be procured in localities convenient to the applicants.

Such certificates shall be issued without charge to the applicant, and shall contain the name, age, local residence, and occupation of the applicant, and such other description of the applicant as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and a duplicate thereof shall be filed in the office of the collector of internal revenue for the district within which such Japanese or Korean makes application.

SEC. 14. That any person who shall knowingly and falsely alter or substitute any name for the name written in such certificate, or forge such certificate, or knowingly utter any forged or fraudulent certificate, or falsely personate any person named in such certificate, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of not more than five years.

SEC. 15. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of Japan and Korea and Japanese and Koreans, whether subjects of Japan or Korea or any other foreign power.

The words "laborer" or "laborers" wherever used in this act shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled manual laborers, including Japanese or Koreans employed in mining, fishing, huckstering, peddling, laundrymen, or those engaged in taking, drying, or otherwise preserving shell or other fish for home consumption or exportation.

The term "merchant" as employed herein and in the acts of which this is amendatory shall have the following meaning and none other: A merchant is a person engaged in buying and selling merchandise at a fixed place of business, which business is conducted in his name, and who, during the time he claims to be engaged as a merchant, does not engage in the performance of any manual labor except such as is necessary in the conduct of his business as such merchant.

Where an application is made by a Japanese or Korean for entrance into the United States on the ground that he was formerly engaged in this country as a merchant, he shall establish by the testimony of two credible witnesses other than Japanese or Korean the fact that he conducted such business as hereinbefore defined for at least one year before his departure from the United States, and that during such year he was not engaged in the performance of any manual labor, except such as was necessary in the conduct of his business as such merchant, and in default of such proofs shall be refused landing.

Such order of deportation shall be executed by the United States marshal of the district within which such order is made, and he shall execute the same with all convenient dispatch; and pending the execution of such order such Japanese or Korean person shall remain in the custody of the United States marshal and shall not be admitted to bail.

The certificate herein provided for shall contain the photograph of the applicant, together with his name, local residence, and occupation, and a copy of such certificate, with a duplicate of such photograph attached, shall be filed in the office of the United States collector of internal revenue of the district in which such Japanese or Korean makes application.

Such photographs in duplicate shall be furnished by each applicant in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

SEC. 16. That any violation of any of the provisions of this act, the punishment of which is not otherwise herein provided for, shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. KEIFER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LANING. Mr. Chairman, I was not a soldier of the civil war, but that was no fault of mine. If I had been born a few years sooner I probably would have been one. Ordinarily the presumption of my knowing anything about the war would be against me, for I was a mere boy then. But I was old enough to remember its scenes and incidents with the vividness of a boy's recollection, and I fully realize the force of that terse and memorable saying of that old hero, "Uncle Billy Sherman," as he was familiarly called, that "War is hell." I as a boy saw the soldiers go out and return, and I saw the home life of the soldier's family, often fuller of sadness and hardship than his lot at the front, little dreaming that the time would come when I as a man might take part in the deliberations of the National Congress upon appropriations for pensions and other legislation for the relief of the suffering and wants of those who took part in that terrible conflict. But I am glad to have the opportunity at this time of expressing my sentiments as to shortcomings that to my mind appear in the methods of executing the pension laws and the wrongs that are seemingly being practiced upon those who, as they went out to defend the Stars and Stripes, had my interest and my sympathy.

The Government called into the Army and Navy millions of men to encounter the dangers of battle, the diseases of camp, and the hardships of military service, and it assumed the responsibility, and impliedly, if not directly, pledged itself to provide an adequate pension system that those who received disabilities and their widows and orphans might be properly cared for. The manner in which this responsibility has been met and the extent to which the obligation has been redeemed need no apology.

I hope I may not be considered out of place for speaking about the administration of the pension laws because of my brief service in this body and my slight opportunity for contact with the problem. But in my short career here I have observed what seem to me as grievous faults in the distribution of pensions, and the peculiar part that Congressmen are taking, in the procedure, which I offer to this House for its consideration.

This Government is now paying out annually for pensions about $140,000,000, distributing it to about 960,000 persons. About 900,000 of these cases arise out of the civil war. The beneficiaries each get, on the average, about $12 per month, and it is undoubtedly true that many of them are obliged to take less than in justice belongs to them. There must be, judging from my own correspondence, a great many old soldiers of the civil war who feel aggrieved at the exactions of the Government examiners who pass upon evidence filed in the Pension Bureau, shown by the frequency and extent to which more proof is called for to support claims; and it is not a great wonder to one who watches and becomes familiar with the process that many anxious but well-meaning applicants become discouraged over their experience in getting a pension in the regular way and besiege their Congressman for the help and advice he can give in surmounting the difficulties. And, considered from this view point, neither is it strange that already there have been introduced into this House at this session more than 12,000 bills for special pensions and at least 4,000 more in the Senate. This appeal to the Congress of the United States, that it give relief from the disparity that is practiced in passing out the pension money we appropriate, is a token of dissatisfaction that speaks in no uncertain or complimentary way.

In the Pension Bureau no applicant is supposed to be given the benefit of any doubt, but, on the contrary, all close questions are resolved against him. In that tribunal there is no presumption in his favor, but he must prove that he is entitled to the pittance he sues for by the clearest evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt. All the technicalities are seemingly invoked against the granting of pensions. All sympathy is barred, and even in the face of favorable reports from the Government boards of surgeons, who give personal examinations and rate the cases, applicants are turned down and increases denied with apparent heartlessness or cold-bloodedness. It is so easy to say that the disease or injury was not of "service origin," or that the disability has not "ratably increased from the pensioned causes," that such phrases have become stereotyped and are parts of form letters sent out to notify applicants of the rejection of their cases.

Slowness of closing up cases in the Pension Bureau is another cause of much complaint. An old soldier gets nervous when he has heard nothing about the progress of his case for several months, and when his claim has been allowed and he does not get his voucher for several months he becomes suspicious and alarmed.

Our daily mail brings us the evidence of this discontent in inquiries and complaints, and this not only swells our correspondence, but it entails upon us much work and loss of time in investigating the causes, remedying the faults, and reporting the results to the inquirers.

With every inquiry we make of the Bureau they are cautious enough to make us certify that it is not made at the request of a pension attorney or claim agent; but still an army of stenographers work at the job in our offices, and another of clerks and their helpers is kept busy in the Bureau of Pensions, looking up cases, searching the evidence, and defining their status. Greater expedition would, if it could be had, make the services of much of this extra force unnecessary, and the work of many of these Government employees could be turned into the direct channels of pension allowance.

But I have no fault to find with this Bureau, or complaint to make as to its efficiency. It is a mammoth institution, employing many people, most of whom have abilities ripened by long experience in the work. At its head is a patriotic gentleman, a former esteemed member of this body, having a high order of talent for the duties intrusted to him in this Department, and a warm friend of the old soldier. His administration of the office has been an acknowledged success. No one could have done better. With the handicaps that have arisen we may well say that it is a wonder that it has been so extremely and uniformly good. It is impossible to eradicate all friction and causes of complaint, and technical rules are necessary to stay the ravages that otherwise might be made on Uncle Sam's pocketbook.

And notwithstanding all the care and consideration that may be exercised and the equity that may be sought in distributing the pension fund, there have been many inequalities committed and much injustice unwittingly practiced in the pensions granted as well as those not granted.

All men do not look upon pension ratings from the same point of view, and when one of the soldier boys easily gets a pension of twenty-four dollars per month and his comrade can get but eight dollars, and that with difficulty, it excites suspicion and creates dissatisfaction. But thanks to the "age law," much of this grievance has disappeared. As a consequence, however, of the remaining disparity, complaints reach us, and we are asked to introduce special bills, to raise up the low spots, and thus restore equality in the distribution of this great national bounty.

And what Congress here does in this line invites to its Members still greater services of the same kind to perform. Our own action is like the appetite that grows by what it feeds upon. Each special bill we get, instead of allaying the demand, brings us a call for a much greater proportion of new ones. The impossibility of reaching every bill in the committee puts a restraint upon the number we can secure, and often is liable to be misconstrued and to bring us unjust criticism and to detract from the credit due to what we do achieve in this line.

We all like to do what we can for our old soldier constituents and get for them a high-rated special bill. But such bills, though a labor of love, may be and are apt to be trouble breeders for us, because the House committee can not give us the opportunity of getting a hearing upon all of the bills we present, and we can not, with no fault of ours, serve equally all our needy soldier constituents.

And is there no remedy for the troublesome condition with which we are here confronted?

In the first place, there is no sense in compelling the old soldier to come to Congress for a special pension, for there ought to be a way to give him relief easier and better without it. I like the work I do for him and he is welcome to my services, to the best of my abilities. It comports with my sympathetic nature and it is with pleasure that I respond to his distress call. I have no aversion in the performance of this work for him. It is no task to me; but it appears to my mind that it could be better done, and more to the satisfaction of the beneficiaries, if a more constant, systematic, and businesslike method of disposing of special cases could supersede the present unfair, unfruitful, and troublesome one.

Some time ago I introduced a general bill to pension imbecile children who had reached 16 years of age at the death of the parent. The pension authorities, under it, can act when the case arises, and a result be secured, as in other regular cases, without the delay and trouble of getting a special act for the unfortunate, as they are now compelled to ask for. True, there are not many such cases—possibly 100 or so each year—but why compel each of them to appear before Congress for relief?

But this is only a step in the proposed right direction. There is, in fact, no valid reason why a method of procedure should be established compelling anybody to come to Congress for pension relief. Why could not a board of review or a commission of some kind, such as the Court of Claims, perform this function? If fifteen men, as a committee of Congress, can be trusted, why can not a similar or a much smaller number of selected civilians do it as well? We ought to have some confidence in the ability and integrity of our fellow-men who are not in Congress. Such a body, having the discretion to pass upon special cases, where full evidence to prove apparent facts can not now be obtained, and to make such awards as the merits of the cases disclose without regard to technicalities, the decisions being based upon humanity and justice, such as would be invoked by a committee of this body, would be a great relief to every Member of this House and a boon to every pension applicant.

Congressmen could then devote themselves more to the statesmenlike duties of studying up and mastering questions of government and finance and internal improvements and the many high and momentous affairs involved in this line of political life.

Such a board could sit frequently or constantly; suitors could go before it at any time, in person or by proof; cases could be disposed of as they come up in a timely manner, and it would be unnecessary to crowd into a few Congressional days a year's accumulation of cases, to be but poorly considered or half acted upon.

This would be a great relief to suitors, and complaints would be reduced to a minimum. Our time could be spent, as I have suggested, in performing higher functions, in passing general pension laws, leaving the administration of them to others having power to act as we would act through our committee, we reposing in confidence that the pension rights of our constituents were being guarded jealously, their cases dispatched with celerity, and administered with equity. I believe this would be a practical reform. It would certainly be an economizer of time, and produce results now impossible.

A successful manager of a great business never devotes his time to small affairs subordinates can do as well as he, but reserves himself for the higher duties which grow out of the performance of the details by others; and so here we ought to reserve our efforts and energies for the many higher, more strenuous, and complex problems that come to our branch of the Government.

But, in the next place, if this proposition be too utopian to be hoped for with prospects of realization, if the old soldier must still come to Congress and have his entreaties for relief placed before this body, it seems to me we can and ought to improve upon our methods, for now in many cases when he asks for bread we are giving him a stone.

There are probably but few people outside of Congress that know there are two pension committees in this body—the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions. They are alike in purposes, but differ in some of their practices.

The Pensions Committee, of which I have the pleasure of being a member and can speak from personal knowledge, considers every bill referred to it, if called for by its author, and recommends for passage every bill of merit.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions considers a part of the bills referred to it, and recommends a part of those considered. Now, I do not want to be considered as speaking disparagingly of this committee. With the number of bills it has before it, and the time it has at its disposal, it appears that this course is a consistent one.

But is there not here a demand for a broader and fairer method? Should not this committee, instead of equipping itself with but one expert to examine its thousands of cases, employ as many as are needed to write up all of them, so that instead of pursuing the policy of pigeon-holing all of the cases of each Member, except four or five he is allowed to select, give each and every bill an equal chance?

There were 2,523 special pensions granted during the Fifty-ninth Congress out of probably 25,000 asked for, and thousands of cases as meritorious, many of them, as those granted were never written up or considered by the Invalid Pensions Committee at all. And why should this discrimination be practiced? Why should not all claimants have the same fair treatment, the same as they are supposed to get before the Pension Bureau, the deserving ones being passed and those without sufficient merit being turned down? With such a course of procedure, Congressmen could go before their constituents without dissimulation, removed of all blame or suspicion of neglect of the old soldier's interest, and what is far better, obtain the proper pension for many who have no other means of securing it.

"Uncle Sam is rich enough to buy us all a farm;" and if so, is abundantly able to pay a good pension to every old soldier entitled to it. Love of country is not a matter of caprice only. You can instill into the minds of our youth a spirit of patriotism by inspiring a reverence for the flag and by reciting to them stories of heroes who laid down their lives to defend it. But real patriotism is born of example, and the Government must show the same devotion to the soldier's interests in time of peace that it wishes the soldier to return to it in time of war. Woe betide the country when it tramples his rights under foot and turns a deaf ear to his just appeals. A government loyal to the people will find loyal subjects, and they will quickly and cheerfully rally to its call when anyone assails its flag or attempts to despoil its institutions.

If Congress is to pursue its present policy, it should be fair to all and put itself in a position to promptly hear and determine all cases presented to it for allowance. It is the only creditable thing to do. If a method can not be worked out superior to the one now in vogue, let us make it an exact, methodical, effective process instead of a happy-go-lucky, catch-as-catch-can, go-as-you-please affair, without a determinate method or policy. There is no middle ground that can be occupied with credit to ourselves or with fairness to the old-soldier element of our constituency. And the Pension Bureau should employ a sufficient force to do all its work quickly. It means only a few more clerks, and they are plenty. As my observation goes, there is no end to the people that want to work for our good Uncle Sam. And I believe Congress is willing to make the appropriation big enough to cover all the needs of a prompt and decisive service.

The old soldier that has pitched his tent on "fame's eternal camping ground" has no need for a pension "over there." What little he wants he wants "down here below," and he is not now going to "want that little long." We ought not to tire out his patience with technicalities. The Halls of Congress should be no place for obstructionists or reactionaries as to pension legislation. We should all be "boosters" instead of "knockers" in the matter of passing all of these special bills that are just.

I am glad that it has been the policy of the Government, in raising money to pay pensions, to pursue such a method of indirect taxation that no one has esteemed it as a burden. That immense and almost incomprehensible sum of nearly $4,000,000,000 paid out for this item since the civil war has been raised, and the one hundred and forty millions now paid out annually passes into the Treasury and out into circulation without the complaint of high taxes from anybody. Think of it, that such an enormous expenditure could have been made annually for over forty years, the Government prospering all the time and the citizens never murmuring. Here is an example for financiering, fortitude, fidelity, and patriotism, the like of which the world never saw before. No nation of the Old World can boast of a record anywise approaching it. [Applause.]

I am for "the old flag and an appropriation for pensions" big enough to treat all the soldiers alike. I think that for pensions we should sever the golden strings of the Government purse with the scissors of liberality. About the best money that the Government spends is its pension money. No finespun theories of finance are needed to figure out its effect on business. It goes into the hands of all classes of citizens, and into all the channels of trade. Thirty-five millions of dollars per quarter is paid out, and it meets the emergency currency situation about the best of anything that has yet been devised. It is more than the Government put into the banks to stop the panic, and if it could have paid out a year's pensions all at that time there would probably have been no financial distress. Our pension appropriation is not only a distributor of money but of happiness to many a household as well.

I hope that the money under the coming widows' pension bill may be speedily paid out to those who are to be its beneficiaries. This reminds me of another thing I hear frequently complained of; that is a delay in paying pensions to widows and orphans upon the demise of the husband and father. It does not seem to me to be just right that there should have been over 11,000 accrued pensions unpaid in the Pension Department at the close of the last fiscal year. When a husband dies, in many cases the widow, deprived of his support, is destitute, and needs quick service by the Government in placing in her hands what is due her, and such claims should be given absolute precedence over all others, and be adjusted with the least possible exaction as to evidence.

For my part I am sorry that the provision of the Sulloway widows' pension bill, now in conference committee, which was in it when it passed the House, extending its benefits to the entire soldiery of the Republic, was stricken out by the Senate, and I hope the House conferees will insist on the retention of the original provision.

The excuse for the amendment, given by the Senate committee in its report, is that nearly all of the widows of the soldiers of the regular Army and Navy and the widows of soldiers who served in the war with Spain are comparatively young women, not incapacitated by age. But this is not an equitable one. When a man is asked to enlist the promise is held out to him that in case he is killed, or succumbs to disease, or dies from wounds received, the Government will, by pension, aid in caring for his widow and orphans. Hence it has no right, by delay, to force such conditions upon them that the widow, to live, must toil and sweat over the washtub for years, endure hunger and poverty, and wear her life away until exhaustion overtakes her, and the children be kept from school and society, and be poorly clothed and fed, to aid her in obtaining a subsistence.

Early in life is when the husband's service would have been most valuable to his family, and this is the time when its absence should be compensated by a contribution from the Government. To wait until old age arrives to those who are compelled to wear their lives out prematurely by the hardships of widowhood forced upon them by the loss of husband in the Government service is practically a denial of help, and as a policy is both unpatriotic and unjust.

The Government's obligation begins immediately upon the occurrence of widowhood, and for this reason the support of these widows and orphans should not be put off until the wars and campaigns in which they served are an almost forgotten fact of history. Ten years ago the war with Spain occurred, and the widows of its soldiers are entitled to pensions now.

What is $8 or $12 per month to the sacrifice of the widow who gave her husband in the prime of life, and $2 per month for the support of the child that was made an orphan by the ravages of this war. And, then, why be obliged to wait for the pittance till the widow is old and is no longer able to provide her own means of subsistence, and the amount is needed to keep her from the almshouse or some other charitable institution or from being a burden to friends or relatives, who generally have enough to do to provide for their own necessities. To decline to contribute toward the care of these widows and orphans, not only in declining years, but while they are needy in earlier years, is base ingratitude and discreditable to both the Government and its chief legislative body. [Applause.]

There are several other general pension bills pending in the Committee on Invalid Pensions that should be passed to do justice to deserving old soldiers, and I hope the committee may soon see its way clear to present them to the House, as I shall be pleased to vote for them and for appropriations commensurate with their requirements. The Taylor bill for the relief of ex-prisoners of war, the Sherwood bill granting a service pension of $1 per day to those who served over eighteen months, and the Dawes bill placing certain volunteer officers on the retired list with pay, the same as those of the Regular Army officers, all measures introduced by my Ohio colleagues, meet my hearty approval.

Time and mortality are thinning the ranks of the old soldiers, and soon the places they have been wont to inhabit will know them no more forever. There were 31,000 deaths of surviving pensioners of the civil war last year, and this year they will undoubtedly reach 50,000. A regiment per week will spread their silent tents and bivouac with the dead "on fame's eternal camping ground." More than 60 per cent of the men and women now living never saw anything of the civil war, having been born since that great struggle, and soon an old soldier of that war will be a curiosity; and most of us, too, who have personal recollections of it, will have our names inscribed on the eternal rolls. Then, let us make the last days of the old soldiers and their dependents more comfortable, their going hence less foreboding, and the fate of those they leave behind less deplorable. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNSEND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the pension appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following concurrent resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 46.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Galveston Harbor, as a whole, including Galveston Harbor, Galveston channel, Texas City channel, and Port Bolivar channel, in the State of Texas, for the purpose of establishing a broad, comprehensive, and systematic plan for the future extension, enlargement, and deepening of said harbor so as to meet the growing needs of commerce, and to estimate the probable cost thereof—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a schedule of documents and papers not necessary for the transaction of the public business—to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for purchase of land adjoining the military reservation at Fort Des Moines, Iowa—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, recommending legislation to transfer to local authorities the right of way of the Cache River road to the Mound City (Ill.) National Cemetery, and also making recommendations as to other roads leading to the same cemetery—to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

R. 18615) to authorize the Cairo and Tennessee River Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Cumberland River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1259), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18616) to authorize the Cairo and Tennessee River Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1260), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. KNOWLAND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate (S. Res. 58) authorizing the Secretary to War to establish harbor lines in Wilmington Harbor, California, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1261), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 653) to authorize commissions to issue in the cases of officers of the Army retired with increased rank, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1262), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 5908) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a dam and bridge across the Missouri River in the State of Montana, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1263), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. KNOWLAND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 6028) to provide for safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1264), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate (S. R. 28) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to donate certain cannon, with their accessories, to the State of New Hampshire, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1265), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House as follows:

Mr. HOWELL of Utah, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5461) for the relief of Lawson M. Fuller, major, Ordnance Department, United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1239), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CANDLER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8924) for the relief of the heirs of Abraham Jones, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1240), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13928) for the relief of P. H. McDonough, of Bardstown, Ky., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1241), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. TIRRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1729) for the relief of Alice M. Stafford, administratrix of the estate of Capt. Stephen R. Stafford, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1242), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LAW, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2886) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late firm of Lapene & Ferre, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1243), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18423) to correct the military record of Mark Tomlinson—Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 6312) granting a pension to Lewis A. Walker—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 12835) granting an increase of pension to Charles May—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 18658) for the relief of Thomas B. Tweedle—Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. POWERS: A bill (H. R. 19407) establishing a light and fog-signal station on or near Clark Ledge, entrance to St. Croix River, State of Maine—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SLAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 19408) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to the Albert Sidney Johnston Camp, No. 1, Confederate Veterans, of San Antonio, Tex., not to exceed fifty obsolete Springfield rifles, bayonets, and bayonet scabbards for the same—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LINDBERGH: A bill (H. R. 19409) to amend the act of Congress authorizing the construction of a dam across the Crow Wing River, in the State of Minnesota—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1908.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, offered the following prayer:

The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made us free from the law and of death.

* * * * * * *

For we know that if the earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building from God—a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

* * * * * * *

We are always of good courage and are willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord.

Even so, Father, come to us. We are Thy children. In life or in death, in strength or in weakness, we can always come to Thee for a Father's voice; we can always rest on a Father's arm.

Father, we ask Thy blessing upon those of his own household, who watched over his illness and who see his face in death. For ourselves, his associates here, we thank Thee for a life which he has given to the service of his country, and we ask Thee to bless us and lift us up, that we may all stand in the presence of our God and of this nation, that each man may consecrate life to heaven and to earth together. These two worlds are one world, and the law of the Spirit of Life makes us free from the fear of death.

Go with us where we go. Stay with us where we stay. We are praying for the Congress, for the nation, Father, for all who loved him and honored him, and for all who prize the government of law, in Christ Jesus.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CULBERSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, it is with feelings of profound sorrow that I announce to the Senate the death of the Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, the distinguished Senator from Maryland. He died last night at his home in Baltimore at 7 o'clock. I had observed within the last few weeks the plainest evidence of his failing health, but, knowing his speedy powers of recuperation, I had strong hopes that he would rally from the attack from which he was suffering. It was otherwise decreed, and, after a long life of remarkable achievements and singular usefulness to his State and to his country, he has passed away.

This is not the occasion to pay the proper tribute to his memory, but it behooves me to say that the State whose noblest aims and best traditions he has so truly represented will mourn him as it would mourn no other of its illustrious sons. From one end of Maryland to the other he will be missed from amongst us as perhaps no other man has ever been missed before. He was the idol of our people.

He was beloved by all classes of the community, and as I left my home this morning the city that he loved and with whose progress his own life was interwoven seemed to be cast down and pervaded with a full consciousness of the great loss that it has sustained. In his palmy days in certain departments of his profession he stood without a peer. In times gone by of great political turbulence and conflict he had no equal as an orator upon the hustings, and his popularity with every element of the people was unsurpassed in my day.

Back of it all there was that which is greater than learning and success and eloquence and popularity, and that was his stainless and unblemished character in public and in private life. It was an honor and a victory to die as he did. Conscious until within a moment of his death, it must have been a glorious realization, inexpressible in words, for him to feel that as he passed into the presence of his Maker he could look back upon a life dedicated to the performance of public and private duties in strict accord with the prompting of his heart and the dictates of his conscience.

Mr. President, genius and ability may perish without hardly a record of their work or a remembrance of their deeds, but a character like his never dies; it stands forth as a beacon light, shedding its rays upon the generations that are to come and casting its halo upon the shores of eternity.

Mr. President, I now send to the desk and ask for the immediate consideration and adoption of the following resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, late a Senator from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator, and that as a further mark of respect to his memory the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 19, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, in whose all-encircling love we dwell and through whose never-failing ministrations our existence is continued moment by moment, hour by hour. Guide us, we beseech Thee, by Thy Holy Spirit of truth to do Thy will, that we may build for ourselves characters which shall be an everlasting memorial to our Maker.

Again we are called upon to chronicle the passing away of one more of the Congressional family, whose long life and public career have gained for him an everlasting place in the history of his State and nation. Comfort his friends, colleagues, and family with the blessed promises of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Indian appropriation bill, to further insist on the disagreement to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference requested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the House further insist on its disagreements to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference requested. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MARSHALL, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

JANITOR TO THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution in lieu of resolution 279.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House for the services of a janitor to the room assigned to the Committee on Ways and Means, in the House wing of the Capitol, compensation at the rate of $60 per month, to commence from the time such janitor enters upon the discharge of his duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the chairman of said committee.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

TELEPHONE MESSENGER.

Mr. CURRIER. I also offer the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CURRIER submitted the following—

"House resolution 280.

"Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House for the services of an additional messenger in charge of telephones on the floor of the House (east side) compensation at the rate of $1,200 per annum, payable monthly, until otherwise provided for by law."

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURRIER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS JAMES RIVER, MISSOURI.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17707.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17707) to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River, in Stone County, Mo., and divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again to create electric power.

Be it enacted, etc., That William H. Standish, of Reeds Springs, Stone County, Mo., his heirs and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam in the big bend of the James River in township 23 north, range 24 west, in the county of Stone and State of Missouri, across the said James River at said point. And that at the narrows in said bend he and they are hereby authorized to impound and by canal and tunnel to divert and conduct across said narrows such portion of the water in said river, through said tunnel, into said river again as may be necessary for electric-power purposes, all subject to and in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the construction of said dam and tunnel shall be commenced within two years of the passage of said act, and be completed within five years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 3, page 1, after the word "That," insert "the consent of Congress is hereby given to."

In lines 4 and 5, page 1, strike out "be, and they are hereby, authorized."

In lines 9 and 10, page 1, strike out "that at the narrows in said bend he and they are hereby authorized," and in line 10, page 1, after the word "impound," insert "at the narrows in said bend."

At the end of section 1 add the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have at all times control of the use of the water, even to the extent of causing the persons, firms, or corporations taking advantage of the privileges granted herein, to cease using the water whenever the same may be necessary for navigation: And provided further, That should the United States in the work of improving the aforesaid river find it necessary to flood the aforesaid tunnels or in any way affect the flow of water through them, the owners or operators of aforesaid tunnels shall have no claim against the United States for damage on account of said flooding of the tunnels or said effect on the flow of water through them."

Strike out all of section 2 and renumber section 3 to section 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FLOYD. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask some questions about the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. FLOYD. I will ask the gentleman to state if this bill affects the White River in Missouri or the James River?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It applies to the James River wholly within the State of Missouri.

Mr. FLOYD. I will ask you if this is in keeping with your original proposition, that the James River should be declared unnavigable?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It is not. That bill was rejected by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and this bill was at their instance prepared and unanimously reported favorably by that committee.

Mr. FLOYD. I will ask you if it in any way protects the navigation of the river?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It does; it gives the Government, through the War Department, absolute control over the flow of the water and the river, reserving the right at any time they desire to do so to have the beneficiaries under this bill cease to use the water, in order that it may be used for navigation.

Mr. MANN. It is under the general dam act.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It is under the general dam law.

Mr. FLOYD. I will ask you if it requires the dam to be completed within a certain time, in keeping with the general law passed in June, 1906?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It does. It leaves the general law as it is. This construction must be begun in one year and completed in three years. It does not change the present general law in that respect.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman if this bill has been approved by the War Department.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It has been approved by the War Department, and I have their report here in my hand.

Mr. SULZER. And I understand it is unanimously reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It is unanimously reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. SULZER. Now, one more question. If this bill should become law, would it in any way interfere with the navigation of the river to which reference is made?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It will not. The War Department has reserved the right to control the water for the purposes of navigation whenever they want to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the pension appropriation bill (H. R. 16268).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, with Mr. CHANEY in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOUSER].

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, the atmosphere of this justly celebrated Chamber is yet vibrant with the thrilling eloquence of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES]. He came, he saw, but failed to conquer.

In burning tones he denounced the principles and policies of the Republican party. His remarks were frequently and vigorously cheered by his followers, but they failed to make an impression upon this side of the House. Knowing him to be a zealous and enthusiastic follower of the distinguished Nebraskan, we refrained from criticism, believing that he was carried away by his cause. Twenty-four hours have passed since the delivery of that notable effort, but I am unable to find any Republican under conviction, and I am sure none have been converted. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

During this session we have heard with interest and pleasure many political speeches. Leaders of both parties have taken occasion to nominate candidates for the Presidency. The Democrats have presented Bryan many times. After the conclusion of their nominating speeches the business of the House was suspended while delighted and enthusiastic followers of "The Peerless" gathered around their eloquent colleagues and warmly clasped their hands and gladdened their hearts with honeyed compliments. It is not my purpose to nominate a candidate for the Presidency. Living in the great State of Ohio, I have full faith and confidence that the coming Republican national convention will place in nomination the man who is pledged to carry out the policies of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentlemen on the other side of this chamber have been painting dark pictures of distress and calamity. Without impugning the honor of any of them, it seems to me that they have been endeavoring to convince the country that the nation is rapidly going to the "demnition bow wows;" that Republican policies are ruinous and monstrous, and that our party has been directly responsible for all the evils of the last fifty years. No one, not even a Democrat, seriously believes this. If there is anything in the power of suggestion, then it seems easy to conclude that incendiary and gloomy speeches universally published and sent to the homes of our people frighten business, paralize industry, and bring on a loss of that confidence so essential to prosperity.

We are too prone to criticise and denounce each other in this Chamber, where business should be conducted in an orderly manner and where the partisan spirit should be suppressed. [Applause.] In our loyalty and devotion to the interests of some distinguished political leader we forget important matters of legislation. As a Republican, I have the greatest respect for the oratory of Mr. Bryan. Indeed no one in this country possesses a higher ability along this particular line. [Laughter on the Republican side, applause on Democratic side.] If he has a marked inclination to run for the Presidency, we Republicans should not complain, for we have defeated him twice, and undoubtedly this will happen again.

Forgetting politics for a time, let Democrats and Republicans work harmoniously for the good of the country. We have heard some criticism of the great Speaker of this House.

These objections have come from those who undoubtedly hold him very high personally.

It seems to me that he has been eminently fair and just and his services have been invaluable to the country. [Applause.]

Having given utterance to a few thoughts and observations which have come to me during this session in this House, I shall proceed now to speak upon the present condition of affairs, and allude for a moment to the important measure under consideration.

It affects the comfort and well-being of hundreds of thousands of our very best citizens. It will bring to them a few of the material blessings of life and brighten their "fading days" with sunshine and peace. The munificence of this great Government arises from its deep appreciation and lasting gratitude for the boys who joined its martial ranks, marched in its valiant armies, and fought its glorious battles. Moved by the highest moral considerations and obligations, Congress will disburse to the worthy remnant of the Grand Army and to the Mexican and Spanish-American warriors the generous sum of nearly one hundred and fifty millions of dollars during the ensuing year. This seems like a prodigious amount of money, and yet distributed among so many it is but small compensation to each of the gallant and heroic men who sacrificed health, comfort, and happiness for the dangers, terrors, and sufferings of ruthless and deadly war.

When we consider the whole-hearted devotion, the unselfish and matchless service, of the brave soldiery of our country, we are wont to wonder why every worthy and true soldier's case is not made the special care and concern of this now united, rich, and powerful nation. As a Member of Congress I know there are cases of veterans living in penury and necessity, their lives darkened by the shadows of poverty and distress. Having ruined their health in the trying ordeals of Army life, they were unfitted to fight the battles of existence, and they are now compelled to live on a mere pittance.

This Government can not afford to be miserly and niggardly with its brave and dauntless defenders.

Just and generous statutes have been enacted within the last few years relieving and assisting many deserving men who were prevented from drawing pensions under the existing requirements of the old laws. Congress should continue its good work along these very just and worthy lines.

Since the close of the great civil war we have marched with gigantic strides to a condition of material prosperity, unmatched and unparalleled in the history of the world. From Appomattox to the present halcyon period of peace our country has marvelously progressed. We stand to-day a leading world power and the richest and most powerful among the nations. We are living in a remarkable age; an age of high advancement and education; an age of noble purposes and high ideals. We look confidently and hopefully toward a bright and enduring future. [Applause.] Through a series of bloody wars, through calamitous and trying experiences, we have finally emerged and become, indeed, a free and united nation.

He who looks with gloomy forebodings through pessimistic eyes at present conditions is indeed cynical and miserable. We have little regard for the prophet of evil who is constantly bewailing his country's fate and who sees disaster and ruin in everything. The tendency is upward. Along with our marvelous and astounding development we are gratified to know that the people are better morally.

A cursory review of the ages past will awaken an immediate appreciation of this great truth. Our churches and schools and a thousand other forces and agencies of this remarkable civilization and age are all leading the people toward higher planes and to higher standards of citizenship. We have been permitted to witness many triumphs for the right, and we are sure there is a wonderful improvement in the business and political world. We may expect in this commercial age, in the land where all men of push, brains, and energy are seeking the richest laurels, that wrongdoing, selfishness, and vice will menace us. Shall this fact frighten us? No; the good far outweighs the bad; the majority of our citizens are honorable and upright and obey the law. One of the very best evidences of our advanced condition is the enactment of wise and beneficent laws against corruption and crime. The railroad-rate law, the pure-food law, and the successful prosecutions carried on under the Sherman law are forcible and gratifying examples of the spirit abroad in our land. In years past the masses were content to be led and directed. To-day they are influencing and directing.

In those days many rich criminals, surrounded and emboldened by wealth and power, insolently violated the law and trampled upon the people's rights. To-day the guilty rich and poor alike are brought to justice, and courts and juries fearlessly and honestly discharge their duties. In the recent past the public conscience seemed to sleep and lawbreakers robbed the guileless and innocent. Not long since men and corporations openly defied the law and thwarted the ends of justice.

Public sentiment seemed to condone and approve. To-day a veritable crusade is on, and questionable methods and reckless systems are being abandoned, and the business world has been benefited and improved thereby. When we consider the wise, corrective, and salutary reforms inaugurated, the just and effective laws enacted by the legislatures of our States and by the Congress of our country during the last few years, we are indeed gratified. I have not the time to specifically refer to these measures, yet it is most pleasing to consider them as guiding stars to a higher and grander destiny. We witness many striking examples resultant from this moral awakening. Many States in the South, and in fact in the whole Union, have adopted many wise and equitable measures for the betterment and advancement of society. [Applause.]

The lawbreaking and law-defying men of this country stirred the public conscience and brought on agitation, investigation, and revelation. An aroused intelligent people are invincible. Lawmakers dependent upon the suffrages of the people for place and honor are impelled to act in accordance with their wishes and demands.

For instance, let me advert for a moment to the railroad-rate legislation. It peculiarly illustrates the effect and potency of a healthy public sentiment. For years the railroads and large and wealthy shippers had entered into secret agreements whereby discriminating rebates and favors were granted over their weak and less powerful competitors. This unfair and unjust practice resulted ruinously to the small shippers and drove many of them out of business. The concessions unjustly granted glutted and enriched monopolies, and they heartlessly brought on disaster to their competitors and wronged the people generally. The inevitable result was that the people complained and protested, and the Elkins law was passed in response to their righteous entreaties. This statute, after a decision of our highest court, failed to bring full and adequate justice to those affected, and the people, in turn, demanded new and more rigorous legislation upon the question.

Our President, faithful to his high trust, eminently courageous, urged Congress to provide a remedy, and there was enacted the present law, which will probably cure the evil. What I have said concerning this legislation might truly be said of the pure-food law, the prosecutions against the trusts, the employers' liability bill, and other just and reasonable measures passed by the States and the nation. It is surplusage for me to add that laws are only enforced when people demand their enforcement. New measures of reform are passed when urged by an awakened, enlightened public sentiment. Officials in any station are constrained to act, to do things, when moved by the righteous petitions and demands of the true legislators—the masses in the factories, in the mines, on the farms, and in the business and professional world. There are exceptions to this rule, but they are rare. There are those thoughtful and considerate persons, with a fine sense of justice, who become leaders of their fellow-men, and this may be said of our Chief Executive, who has played an important part in bringing on a new era of decency and honesty. [Applause.] The present conditions have affected and injured only the few in the business and political world who have been guilty of misdeeds and who have hitherto successfully defied the law.

It is natural to expect that this offending class will protest, denounce, and defame. There is no doubt but what they are freely spending some of their ill-gotten millions in an endeavor to change the tide of public sentiment and to discredit the determined, unflinching, and incorruptible public men who have assisted in bringing on their exposure, discomfiture, and punishment. They cry "Socialist!" "Demagogue!" "Revolutionist!" They predict dire and widespread calamity to the country. Indeed, they seem to enjoy and glory in the present panicky condition. The people understand; they will not be misled nor deceived. The more they decry, criticise, and slander, the more popular will become the measures and policies upheld and supported by those who believe that the safety and perpetuity of the Republic depends upon the strict and honest enforcement of just and equitable laws. [Applause.] Indeed, the present state of affairs, the crusade against dishonesty and injustice, grew directly out of the reckless disregard of the principles of right and justice. It seems to me that an examination of the question will show that the present agitation and unusual activity of our lawmakers and chief executives, in the States and in the Union was prompted by the willful and criminal acts of those who flagrantly violated the very tenets of right and honor. If this be true, then the wrongdoer and offender should change his ways of business and institute a new and better condition of affairs.

I notice that the president of the great steel corporation has frankly acknowledged that he is in accord with the present policies and that they will be adopted hereafter in the control and management of this great concern. I presume this could be remarked of many other corporations in the industrial world. Let us disregard the violent and unjust criticism against honorable officials who are doing their duty under their oaths. Let us encourage honest business and assist it in every way in attaining greater success. Let us refuse to believe that the punishment and imprisonment of wrongdoers is responsible for the present condition of industrial depression. Let us believe that the great mass of our citizens will in the end profit immeasurably by weeding out and destroying the corrupt and depraved few who are a menace and a curse to the many. We may go further and reason that offended and offending classes, checked in their mad career for wealth and power, defeated and enraged, have by their unjust assaults upon the present Administration contributed to the temporary unrest and loss of confidence at present prevailing. Let us be optimistic and hopeful. These are inspiring words. The great producing millions are rich from the fruits of the last decade of our country's remarkable prosperity. Our nation is sound at the heart. When the present artificial spell is broken money will seek the channels of legitimate trade, the fires will be lighted in our furnaces, and our factories will resume full operation. Our laboring men, the most intelligent, the most enlightened, and the most skilled in all the world, will march with elastic step and cheerful countenances to our busy hives of industry. Honesty will guide and direct our matchless industrial enterprises, and peace and plenty will sing in the joyous homes of our happy people. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY].

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman, unlike some of the other gentleman, I want to talk on the bill before the House for consideration. We live in a time when there is an agreement upon some things, and there seems to be an agreement upon this question of appropriation for the pensions for the heroes of the United States, and I want to submit to this House the liberality with which the United States of America has taken care of its heroes. And this, too, by Republican Congresses and by Republican Presidents.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the bill now offered for passage appropriates for pensions for those who have long ago severed their connection with the Army and Navy, as a grateful recognition for their services to their country in the time when services were needed and when the country's life hung in the balance, the sum of $150,869,000. Compare these figures with the amount appropriated this session for the military and naval establishments of the Government—

The Army appropriation bill appropriates this time	$85,007,566.56
The Naval appropriation bill appropriates this time	103,967,510.43
Total for both establishments	188,975,076.99

The difference between the active military and naval needs of the Government and what is paid out for pensions is $38,106,076.99. The proposed widows' increase will reduce this difference to less than $25,000,000.

What a showing this is! And this, too, after having taken over the insular possessions and the guardianship of Cuba. The like of this is unknown in any other country in the world.

The number of enlisted men in the Navy is 38,848. The Army embraces at this time, in all branches, 63,412 enlisted men.

We have a moderate Navy and a small standing Army, and these establishments cost so little, comparatively, that we can afford, and do afford, to pay to the country's aged defenders of the years agone a helpful sum to make their hands easy and their hearts light as they approach the "silent river."

This Republic does not forget its heroes.

This Government has disbursed in pensions, since the Revolutionary war, $3,598,015,723.69. Of this princely sum three and one-half billions have been paid out since June 30, 1865.

There was issued in bounty land warrants up to 1855 an acreage of 68,768,310, which served as a lump-sum pension to the soldiers who availed themselves of it.

The total number of pensioners now on the pension rolls is 967,371. Forty-five thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight of the brave men of the wars have answered the last roll call during the last fiscal year, and of this great mortality 31,201 were soldiers of Abraham Lincoln—nearly 2,000 more than in any preceding year of the country's history.

There were added to the pension rolls by special acts during the Fifty-ninth Congress 534 persons, and 5,848 persons had their pensions increased by special acts during that Congress. Six thousand three hundred and eighty-two private acts were therefore passed by the Fifty-ninth Congress. The additional amount of money carried by the special acts equals $902,061.

Since the beginning of the civil war 19,737 special acts have been passed, 12,362 of the beneficiaries of which are yet on the rolls, of the annual value of $3,502,650; but only about half of which is chargeable to these special acts, since the pensions are increases.

At the last session of Congress there was passed what is styled the "McCumber bill," which added to the pension rolls but 8,930 persons, and yet 322,177 persons were benefited by that act. That act increased the annual value of the pension rolls $17,548,671. This act did a great deal of good and helped a great many more men than it was supposed it would.

There is pending for passage at the present Congress, and which will doubtless pass, a bill giving to all lawful widows of honorably discharged volunteer soldiers a pension of $12 per month—and which, if same does become law, will add $14,000,000 to $15,000,000 more to the annual value of the pension rolls.

The average annual value of pensions now granted each soldier is $145.60, which is equal to a 4 per cent Government bond of $3,640.

The average annual value of pensions now granted each soldier in the regular establishment is $173.12, which is equal to the income from a Government bond, at 4 per cent interest, of the sum of $4,328.

Under the general law, civil war, the average annual value of pensions to each soldier is $204.20, which equals the income from a 4 per cent Government bond of the sum of $5,105.

The average annual value of pensions granted to each soldier under the act of June 27, 1890, is $112.32, which equals the proceeds of a Government 4 per cent bond of the amount of $2,808.

The average annual value of pensions granted to each soldier in the war with Spain is $127.19, which equals the proceeds from a bond of $3,180, drawing 4 per cent interest.

The average annual value of pensions granted each soldier under the act of February 6, 1907 (McCumber law), is $170.09, equal to 4 per cent on $4,252.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANEY. Yes.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman state again how many are drawing a full $12 under the act of June, 1890? I think the gentleman stated the number of pensioners, or, possibly, the amount.

Mr. CHANEY. I stated the amount paid, not the number of persons.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman kindly give the amount paid, again, under the act of 1890?

Mr. CHANEY. I think that the gentleman misunderstood what I gave. It was the number of persons under the McCumber bill which was added to the pension rolls—8,930—and the number of persons whose pensions have been increased—322,177.

Mr. BATES. Has the gentleman at hand the number of pensioners who have reached the limit of $12 under the act of 1890?

Mr. CHANEY. I have the amount at hand, and I will submit it with my remarks.

Mr. BATES. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to ask his opinion whether he does not believe that soldiers—veterans who have become disabled, totally disabled—ought to draw more than $12?

Mr. CHANEY. Yes; I will come to that in just a moment.

Mr. BATES. I have noticed that the Committee on Invalid Pensions this year are almost automatic in raising pensions from $12 to $24—the pensions of veterans who are totally disabled. Should not the general law cover such cases, so that Congressional aid would not need to be sought where a soldier, possibly who has served his full three years, who has been in many battles but was never wounded, possibly never had any hospital service and can not show disability in the service, but who yet is paralytic, or through rheumatism or disease of the heart is disabled and needs the assistance of others, and receives only $12? Does he not think that in the munificence and magnanimity and generosity of this Government the next move in the pension laws should be to raise all soldiers who are now totally disabled up to at least $24 a month?

Mr. CHANEY. I certainly do, and that will be the next effort of the Congress in that respect.

Mr. BATES. I introduced a bill in December last amending the act of 1890, that all soldiers who are totally disabled shall receive $24 instead of $12. It seems to me now an act of justice and almost of necessity that such provision should be made.

Mr. CHANEY. Yes; I think, as my remarks will continue, the gentleman will see the trend of our opinion in the committee. I want to carry this same matter a little further, about which I was talking.

A soldier who gets a pension of $20 per month, or $240 per annum, has an income from a Government 4 per cent bond of $6,000.

A soldier who draws a pension of $30 per month, or $360 per year, has an income from a Government 4 per cent bond of $9,000.

These pensions are the highest grade of Government bonds, and fortunate and honored is the man who has one.

This income is not taxable, and therefore enhanced in value by this fact at least $1.50 per hundred of the bond value of the pension granted in each case. If a soldier's $9,000 4 per cent bond were put upon the market, it would bring at least $9,135.

The McCumber Act of last winter awards a pension of $12 per month to every soldier when he arrives at 62 years of age; $15 per month at 70 years of age, and $20 per month at 75 years of age. This law ought to have fixed $15 per month at 65 years of age, $20 per month at 70 years of age, and $30 per month at 75 years of age. If this had been done, justice would have been pretty well served. The House Committees on Pensions called attention to this at the time the act was passed.

There is a class of men, however, not provided for by any law, namely, those totally disabled for the performance of manual labor from causes other than disabilities contracted in the service, and who are without other income than their pensions. Hundreds of these cases besiege us now. These cases are the necessity for private pension bills. There are so many of these cases that the Invalid Pensions Committee can not begin to meet the demand. Work as hard as we may and do, we can not do enough of this worthy service. The House Committees on Pensions called attention to these men when the McCumber bill was put upon its passage.

It has been a serious question for some time how to provide for this class of soldiers, who must sooner or later be provided for by some general law.

There are those who believe that a dollar-a-day law should be passed, and I am one of those who believe this might be done. I received a number of petitions from individual soldiers and G. A. R. posts to this Congress favoring a dollar-a-day law, and I submitted the same to the House for its consideration. The soldiers, however, are not agreed on the proposition. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] claimed in a recent speech before the House to have a number of petitions from residents from certain of the soldiers' homes, and perhaps from a few individuals and G. A. R. posts, asking for the passage of a dollar-a-day law, and exhibited several of them during his remarks on that occasion, but he has never presented his alleged petitions to the House for its consideration, and must therefore be regarded as not, in reality, favoring the proposition.

There is one thing upon which the country is now agreed, at all events, that no soldier who served his country in the Army or Navy when war threatened its life or when foreign enemies assailed us shall ever suffer for the necessaries of life because of physical inability to earn a livelihood. We have lived and now live amid a wonderful civilization and a surprising progress, but we have not lived so fast nor grown so strong that we have forgotten, or ever will forget, the men who made it possible to enjoy the manifold blessings which are vouchsafed to the American people.

We appreciate full well the men who saved the country whole, whose chivalry and patriotism saved, under the providence of God, the nation born to duty and to destiny.

Already we begin to realize the prophecies in the "Battle hymn of the Republic." Dewey's guns in Manila Bay spoke the language of a righteous force and a glorious flag because of Appomattox.

There is no other country which dispenses to its heroes in the military and naval service with such liberal hand as the United States, and no other country depends upon a volunteer army to fight its battles and defend its name like that of the United States. No other country pursues the policy of a pension roll of honor like the United States.

In 1859 Russia established an emerital fund by donation from the imperial treasury of 7,500,000 rubles, and a subsequent supplementary gift of 2,400,000 rubles, aggregating 9,900,000, equal to $5,098,500, as the basis for a pension fund, which was placed at interest. To this is added assessments of 5 and 6 per cent on the amount of the officers' pay, and also the interest and profits from interest-bearing bonds belonging to the fund.

Those entitled to pensions under this fund are such persons as have served twenty-five years in the Army or Navy and have contributed to the fund for twenty years, except those wounded in battle and those who during their military service have become paralyzed, insane, or totally blind and not fit for further service, but necessitating the aid and attendance of another person.

The system is very complicated, lacks liberality, and falls short of justice to soldier and sailor. The officers take the bulk of the money thus bestowed and the rank and file are put off with a pittance.

Great Britain grants pensions for length of service and disabilities contracted in service, and in 1898-99, the last attainable data, there was appropriated on account of pensions £1,811,927, equal to $8,769,726.68.

Germany grants pensions for length of service and for disabilities in the service. In 1898 the pension appropriation was 91,000,000 marks, equal to $21,208,000.

France grants pensions upon retirement from active service and for wounds or disabilities contracted in the service. In 1898 the pension appropriation was 130,949,000 francs, equal to $25,430,295.80.

Brazil pursues a policy much like that of Russia, and in 1899 paid in pensions the sum of $663,000.

Belgium authorizes pensions for length of service, on age, and for disabilities contracted in the line of duty. In 1898 there was appropriated $941,426.

Austria-Hungary takes care of its military officers and men—

1. By the grant of life or temporary pensions.
2. By the grant of additional allowances for disabilities.
3. By admission to invalid homes.

In 1899 there was an appropriation for pensions of all kinds of 14,297,975 gulden, equal to $5,719,190.

The Argentine Republic pensions its officers and men for disabilities in service so long as they remain in the country.

In 1899 there was appropriated for pensions $1,299,540.

The military pension of Chile is considered a charitable institution, but pensions are granted after ten years' service, unless disabilities are contracted while in service. The pension appropriation for the year 1899 was 1,859,717.39 pesos, equal to $678,796.70.

Peru appropriated for pensions in 1898 £62,669, equal to $303,317.96.

Portugal appropriated in the same year $841,471.

Japan is most liberal of any of the foreign governments and grants pensions in every conceivable case. There is appropriated each year for pensions in Japan liberal sums.

All governments provide for the widows of soldiers and sailors and their dependent families.

The United States pays out on account of pensions nearly three times as much as Great Britain, Germany, and France combined.

The system followed by the United States is unlike that of any other country, since we provide for the soldier or sailor as generously as does any other country for disabilities contracted in the service and for wounds and other injuries in war, and also for the volunteer soldiers and sailors, whether they are disabled from the service or not, or even whether they are disabled at all, and in amounts in excess of other nations. We also provide for the widow and the orphan and the dependent father and mother.

Gratitude is an element of our pension system and our pension roll is one of honor and distinction.

In addition to money pensions there are numerous National and State soldiers' and sailors' homes, where the comforts of a hotel are provided for all those who choose to go there.

Act of July 14, 1862, embraced in sections 4692 and 4693, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides for a pension to all those of the Army and Navy who have suffered disabilities in the service, and their widows and children.

Act of July, 1866, extended to widows and children the pensions of deceased soldiers, and in certain cases to mothers of deceased soldiers.

THIRTEENTH STATUTES AT LARGE.

An act making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensioners of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1865 (p. 3).

An act to increase the pensions of revolutionary pensioners now on the rolls of the Pension Office (p. 39).

An act relating to the compensation of pension agents (p. 325).

An act supplementary to an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862 (p. 387). Pensions to those who have lost both feet, both hands, or eyes; volunteers not enlisted, disabled by wounds, to have benefits of pension laws, and relating to the status of the widows and dependents of such volunteers, and relative to the payment of accrued pensions; granting title to enlisted soldiers disabled in the service, though not mustered in, and providing pensions for their widows and dependents; providing for proof of marriage in claims of widows of colored soldiers, and the repeal of inconsistent laws.

An act supplementary to several acts relating to pensions (p. 449).

This act provides for pensions for acting assistant or contract surgeons; if disabled by wound received or disease contracted while actually performing the duties of acting assistant or contract surgeon with any military force in the field or in transitu or in hospital; persons losing a hand or foot to have $20 per month; widows or children of certain officers and other persons to receive pensions.

An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions. (14 S. L., 56.)

This repeals section 5 of the act approved March 3, 1865, and provides pension of $25 per month for persons who while in the military or naval service or line of duty have lost the sight of both eyes, the loss of both hands, or have been permanently and totally disabled in same, or otherwise so permanently disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so as to require the constant aid and attendance of another person; and a pension of $20 per month for persons, who, under like circumstances, lost both feet or one hand or one foot, or have been totally permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor; and a pension of $15 per month to persons who, under like circumstances, lost one hand or one foot, or have been totally and permanently disabled in the same or otherwise so disabled as to render their inability to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot.

Provides when heirs of persons entitled to invalid pension may receive same, and for the payment of pensions of officers dying after date of commission but before being mustered out.

Period of service to extend to the time of disbanding the organization to which the person belonged or until they are actually discharged for other cause than the expiration of service of the organization.

Enlisted men to be treated as noncommisioned officers or privates.

When children are abandoned by a widow or she is not a suitable person to have custody of them, pensions may be paid to the minor children.

When orphan brother or sister may receive pension.

No person to receive more than one pension at a time.

If claim for pension not filed in three years, pension to commence from the date of filing the last paper in the case by the party prosecuting the same.

Proof of marriage in claims filed by widows of colored soldiers.

An act increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes. (14 Stat. L., 230.)

This act extends the provisions of the pension law to provostmarshals, their deputies, and enrolling officers, and pensions widows of soldiers and sailors, and increases $2 a month each child under 16 years of age.

If during pendency of the claim for invalid pension the applicant dies, provides for the payment of the accrued pension.

Provides that a widow who has remarried may be paid pension to the date of her remarriage.

Act July 23, 1868 (15 Stat. L., 170)—appropriation bill:

Section 2: Interest on naval pension fund shall hereafter be at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, in lawful money, and shall be applicable exclusively to the payment of Navy pensions according to existing laws.

Act July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. L., 235)—an act relating to pensions:

Section 2: Pensions to be granted for wounds received or disease contracted only in line of duty.

Section 4: Widow entitled to receive $2 per month for each minor child under 16 years of age by former marriage of soldier, etc., dying since March 4, 1861, during the time such widow has the custody, care, and maintenance of such child or children.

Section 5: Widow or guardian not to be deprived of additional pension of $2 per month for each child under 16 years of age if the child is an inmate of charitable institution.

Section 6: As to commencement.

Section 8: Pensions not to be allowed to widows abandoning their children or being unsuitable persons to have charge of them, but children shall receive such pension.

Section 9: When person entitled to a pension has died since March 4, 1861, while an application for pension is pending, leaving no widow or child under 16 years of age, his or her heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to which applicant would have been entitled had certificate been issued before his or her death.

Section 10: Remarriage of widow or mother not to deprive her of right to pension for period before her remarriage.

Section 11: Pensions volunteers not enlisted, but disabled by wounds.

Section 12: Persons having but one eye, and losing that, given $25 per month.

Section 13: Pensions accruing after the war of the Revolution and prior to March 4, 1861, to be placed on same footing as provided in section 3, act of July 25, 1866, and Revolutionary widows to be paid $8 per month.

Section 14: Officers of the rank of captain in Army and lieutenant in Navy and of less rank who have lost arm or leg in service and line of duty, or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted therein, shall be entitled to receive an artificial limb on same terms as privates in Army.

SIXTEENTH STATUTES AT LARGE.

An act construing certain acts therein cited in relation to pensions (16 Stat. L., 191) provides that amounts fixed by special acts granting pensions should not be increased or reduced by other laws.

An act to define the duties of pension agents and to prescribe the manner of obtaining a pension, and for other purposes (16 Stat. L., 193), provides that pension agents shall send by mail quarterly to a pensioner whose pension is paid at his agency a voucher, to be executed and returned by him to the agent, and when voucher is received at agency, to draw check to the order of pensioner for the amount due; that, if thought necessary by the Commissioner of Pensions, a pensioner may be required to receive his pension personally. Pensions to be paid only to the persons entitled thereto and prohibiting the recognition of a warrant, power of attorney, or other paper, for the purpose of having pension paid to any other person than the pensioner; provides for the payment of pensions to the guardians of persons laboring under legal disabilities.

An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers (16 Stat. L., 441) provides a pension at $8 per month for the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men in the militia and volunteers of the military and naval service who served sixty days in the war with Great Britain of 1812 and who were honorably discharged, and to the widows of such officers, and so forth, and providing for the proof required in such cases.

The act of 1890, for all soldiers and sailors who served ninety days or more in the war of the rebellion and were honorably discharged therefrom, although their disabilities may not have been contracted in the service, and for a pension to their widows, provided they were without income of over $250 per year—during Harrison's Administration.

Appropriation act of April 24, 1906, made the age of 62 years and over a permanent disability within the meaning of the pension laws.

Act of February 6, 1907, has been mentioned, and the benefits of this act were extended to those pensioned under the acts of June 27, 1890; February 15, 1895, and joint resolution of July 1, 1902, or the acts of January 29, 1887; March 3, 1891, and February 7, 1897.

In addition to pensions, land grants, and Soldiers' Homes, the United States cares for the sacred ashes of those who answer the last roll call by marking their last resting places with enduring tablets and in great national cemeteries, as follows:

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss a question of universal interest, and, if I may be pardoned for saying so, of very little unanimity of opinion. There are three main schools of thought on the money and banking question represented in this Congress. The first proposes to retain, enlarge, and patch our present credit currency, and do no more. The second proposes to abolish our present credit currency, substitute a different credit currency, and establish a system of bank safety. The third school, to which I belong, proposes to leave our credit currency untouched, but to establish a system of bank safety or deposit guaranty. Two days ago I prepared this argument and wrote this paragraph: "There is a division in the ranks of the first school; one wing opposes, the other favors, repeal of all restrictions on the right of banks to retire their note circulation. One favors, the other opposes, including railroad bonds in the list of securities for the issue of emergency currency. This difference is so vital that it might justify classifying the opponents as of different schools were it not minimized and stress of battle so laid upon another difference between them as to perhaps result in ignoring the differences already stated and deciding the controversy between them upon the other difference, which is simply this: One contends that the credit currency of banks, ordinary and emergency, shall be issued by the Government as Government currency and delivered to the banks, and banks only, upon application and deposit of security; the other, that it shall be issued by the Government through the banks as bank currency upon application of the banks and security deposited by the banks, the currency in either case to be clothed with the same functions, to be controlled in volume and circulation by the banks, and to be redeemed by the Government. To have all these notes alike, in form as in substances, would be better, but I venture to say that this great battle, upon which constitutional learning and judicial research are exhausted, is one about which the banks do not care a baw-bee. To have a pitched battle or sham battle on this issue in one part of the field seems to me empty sound and fury 'et preterea nihil.' The people wage their fight—it may be a losing one—and call their leaders to the front in another part of the field to win for them safety of their deposits."

Since that writing—in fact yesterday—the papers tell us the leader of the majority in the Senate has consented and the committee of that body in charge of the Senate banking and currency bill have unanimously eliminated from it the feature which repealed the present restrictions upon the retirement of bank notes and the provision which included railroad bonds in the list of securities for the issuance to banks of emergency currency. For this action, I take it, we are to thank an aroused public opinion or the fear of public condemnation. If under the new currency measure too rapid contraction should produce falling prices and hard times—and perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin, who was insisting that railroad properties should be valued if their bonds were to become the basis of national currency—but whatever the cause of the action, it leaves the contention between the two wings of school No. 1 referred to simple and single; that is, whether our paper currency shall be issued in the name of the Government or in the name of the banks, but in either case to be alike in functions, redemption issuance, retirement volume, and circulation, and in all other respects. I have, sir, but one purpose, and that is to sustain the proposition that provides a sure guaranty of bank deposits.

Mr. Chairman, all nations have had what they called money, and all actual money has in itself had commercial value. In uncivilized nations commercial credit was unknown; all trade was by barter and actual transfer of the physical thing.

As soon as credit—commercial credit—is born to a nation an immense forward step is taken and thereafter business is transacted, trade is carried on, not by swapping commodities or by giving money for commodities only, but also by giving written obligations or credit in exchange for commodities.

The first stage of credit, like the first money, was crude and without system. Seashells, hides, iron, copper, silver, gold, was money, and personal notes and memoranda and agreements were the commercial credit, and the only commercial credit system. There was in fact for ages no system of either money or credit. They were equally insecure, uncertain, and crude. A coin or hide was uncertain as to its quantity or quality without scales to weigh or means to measure or test them surely and reliably. The note or credit obligation was not always certain as to its meaning and never certain as to fulfillment. For centuries money chaos reigned. Certain coins issued by private individuals acquired great reputation for their widely known worth and honesty, but in general money was a poor instrument of exchange so long as it rested solely on individual integrity, and therefore governments by the exercise of undoubted paternalism stepped in and took charge of all the coinage of money, fixing its quantity, its quality, and relative value, and stamping these upon it in the act of coinage. This, I apprehend, was all that the Constitution meant by giving Congress the power to "coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins." It also had the power to emit bills of credit, but this is another matter. At that time our own coins were few and it was better to have some constituted authority to fix the relation of foreign coins than not, so Government paternally assumed the authority. Our Government has long since abandoned that authority. Not very many ages ago governments were hardly more honest than individuals and often the royal treasury was replenished by deliberate government debasement of the coin while private dishonesty clipped and filed and mutilated it, so that many coins were hardly more fixed in value than a wild-cat bank note. But interest, if not honesty, at last brought laws and practices in all governments, securing honest coins and punishing and practically preventing private clipping and mutilating and counterfeiting, and rendering every coin as certain in value as in name. The merely securing, however, the certain weight and quality of all coins by the Government was not the end of the question. The unfortunate, perhaps unavoidably unfortunate language of our Constitution, very fit and proper at the time and for the purposes for which it was framed, gave rise to an idea, which became a fixed belief in many minds, that there was some mysterious talismanic power in government which could alter or fix the relative and real value of different coins and different metals by its mere stamp and declaration. So confused became ideas that learned men lost sight of the real origin and nature of money and the purely paternal functions of government pertaining thereto; and, misquoting the Constitution, often declared that the Government had the power to issue money, bestow its value, and overthrow all the principles affecting exchange, and so there grew up a school having men of no mean ability advocating purely fiat, irredeemable paper money.

There was hidden also in the language of the Constitution and in the money systems of many nations not only the seeds of this irredeemable paper money contention, but also the double and single standard and the metallic ratio controversy. The Constitution just as clearly authorized the fixing of a triple or quadruple standard as of a double standard and the establishment of a legal ratio between silver and copper as between silver and gold. The right to "coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins" surely gave as much authority to fix the ratio between gold and copper and brass and the ratio between American and foreign coins as between gold and silver only, but as I said before our Government soon dropped all pretense of regulating the value of foreign coins. It did so in fact as soon as the supply of our own money enabled us to trade without the use of foreign coin, which was much in vogue at the adoption of the Constitution. It never undertook to fix any ratio between gold and copper. The use, however, of both gold and silver alternately or contemporaneously by all civilized nations continued so long and persistently that a fancy grew into a conviction that there was something sacred or peculiar and inviolate about the money function of gold and silver, and everywhere there was the strange, illogical attempt to fix, or find and make stable the commercial ratio of value between the two by law. For nearly a century this effort troubled the statesmanship of the nations. As simple a thing as the question of intrinsic value muddled the statesmen of nations, but these controversies are now settled and the gold standard now prevails in all civilized lands.

Long before the money standard was settled the credit currency question assumed a dark aspect and at times overshadowed all questions of money proper. A certain man by the name of Law took up the shattered finances of France and, as with a magic wand, began to create fabulous wealth by the mere touch of a pen, and a mushroom era of bubble prosperity grew till it burst of its mere emptiness. A South Sea scheme in England, of like origin, growth, and ending, spread wreck and ruin in that country. Making money with pen and ink or printing press has a peculiar fascination that affects the heads of the sober and makes men drunk with the mad desire for gain. To come down nearly to our own generation: Before the war, banking in most if not all the States became very popular. It was so easy. A charter, a printing press, and office room, and the trick was done.

The money rolled in crisp, new notes, promises to pay, that floated out on all the winds of heaven, the farther the better. Then there were "flush times in Alabama" and elsewhere for the promoters; but the children of men were sore vexed and grieved, and some of the States are even yet valiantly paying by way of interest for the brief spell of lurid intoxication of paper prosperity enjoyed long years ago. While this era was winding to an unhappy finish, a darker terror than the goblin of greedy and gambling money and banking raised its awful form in the midst of our devoted land. With one foot upon the North and one foot upon the South it blew a blast, first north and then south, of deadly hate and strife.

Then bloody war laid low our noblest and best and ended in the canonization of two martyrs, one the chieftain of the North, struck down by the bullet of a fevered assassin, enshrined in all your hearts of the North, the other the chieftain of the South, sick and in prison and in chains for weary weeks and months for our alleged transgressions, no less enshrined in all of our hearts of the South.

But this aside. The war, through the wisdom of chance, put an end to wild-cat banking, but not an end to banking evils and errors. The Federal Government, as all governments have in time of stress, issued its bonds, also its legal-tender promissory notes, and then to aid their bonds established or authorized the bank note based on bonds and practically prohibited all other bank notes.

But Government notes and bank notes depreciated. They were made legal tender, but no power has yet been found to make a promise not ready to be redeemed equal to the thing promised, and no power is needed to so make a promise ready to be redeemed.

With peace, the bank notes and Government notes began to approach to real money in value. At first, perhaps, no one in authority had made any study of these bonds, notes, and paper currency, except as war measures intended to strengthen the Government's credit and replenish its Treasury in time of need. The credit of our credit currency became an issue of prime importance, and the collection of a gold-redemption fund and resumption of specie payment was at last accomplished.

When all this had been done our financial system had two things of great worth: It had actual money of fixed value and it had a credit currency of equal and equally certain value. But with these two good things—good money and good credit currency—went the establishment of a banking system peculiarly our own. Since then silver has depreciated, and now we have a half credit money, silver, and a paper or wholly credit currency and a banking system with which the Government is almost hopelessly and inextricably mixed and tangled, and which at times has placed the Government at the mercy of the money changer whenever conditions arise which put in operation the mechanism of the endless chain so freely used from 1890 to 1893.

But this is not all or perhaps the greatest evil of our money and banking system. By the bond-secured bank-note system, and by the prohibitory tax on other bank notes, and the want of any banking system our commercial credit has been put in a strait-jacket, and the limbs of our giant commerce are bound with iron bands, or to change the figure, credit, which for a great commerce should have the freedom of the air to flow into every vacuum, is fixed and immovable, so that with more money and more credit currency than ever was before in our land, natural industry is to-day smothered and can not breathe because all our credit and money is locked fast in strong boxes and can not enter the currents of trade and industry.

Now, this, it seems to me, is all the fault of our system of banking, and banking alone, which by its insecurity has, without figure of speech, made every dollar of money stop still in the pocket of its possessor and absolutely destroyed the operation of credit.

All panics have their causes. Statesmanship can and should prevent the causes. There is a vast difference between hard times and a panic. Hard times is the winter's chill pinch; panic is the tempest's blast. The earth may not bring forth, the seasons may fail, pestilence may prevail, seven lean years may bring famine. This is hard times. Hard times may, too, in a less degree arise from the decreasing volume of money and consequent shrinkage of the price of labor and products of labor, and so be the result of a monetary system, as was the case from 1882 to 1896, but panic is the fearful child of credit alone. The cause of the panic of 1890 to 1896 seems clear to me. It was not, except remotely, connected with the tariff, but was connected with the long agitation of the question of standard money. It was not a Republican panic, except as Republican legislation and want of legislation had led up to it. It was not a Democratic panic. The ages had not settled the simple question that a standard was a standard and not two standards, or a double standard, or a triple standard. Vast millions of debtors owed vast billions of debts. A proposition was presented to establish, in name, a double standard, but, in fact, in the opinion of the creditor classes, a silver standard. Its agitation began about 1876, fostered by Republicans and Democrats alike. It grew under the operation of hard times brought about by the decrease of the circulating medium in comparison with the growth of commerce, $225,000,000 bank notes being retired from 1882 to 1891; and production increasing, prices fell lower and lower for ten years steadily; vast fortunes for the few, under tariff laws and trust and railroad manipulation, grew, while the masses struggled with the increasing burden of debt and poverty.

The struggle between the masses and the classes grew tense and violent, and great leaders on both sides presented with startling vigor appeals based on unquestioned conditions and made from undoubted honesty of convictions to the masses to adopt the double standard as a cure for the ills they knew they bore. These very appeals intensified their ills. The creditors became alarmed. Gold all retired or took flight, still further decreasing the circulating medium; debtors were pushed. To obtain and to hoard gold the "endless chain" was put in operation. The very credit of the Government toppled. Fear rode upon the winds and the panic was upon us. In the political contests that followed a strange spectacle was presented. One party paltered with the people, presenting a Delphic oracle for a platform and prating of an international commission and agreement for a double standard, not daring to defend even the right as they saw it; and the other party, even in an error, as I see it, bold, fearless, and honest, declared their faith and were led by a general, mistaken though I believed him to be, honest, fearless, brave as Pickett at Gettysburg, or the Old Guard at Waterloo. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Stranger still, all over the land in every great city, thousands and thousands of workingmen who could not and did not vote for him because they believed that to lower the money standard meant to lower their wage standard, followed and cheered that leader to the sky, because they knew and felt that his heart was of gold, and every drop of blood in his veins counted his devotion to the common people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The cause of that panic was plain, and its cure was also plain. When the fear of the creditor was gone the panic was over, and when the increasing production of gold and the increasing issue of bank notes expanded our currency, neither of which was even aided by any Republican policy, the wheels of commerce began to turn, prices began to rise, and the Republican party, coming into power, have blessed the tariff, fostered the tariff, retained the same old dangerous banking system, fostered the trusts, and fattened on corruption and its contributions to their campaigns ever since.

The campaign of the Democratic party in 1896 and subsequent events have demonstrated clearly the Democratic contention that an increasing volume of the circulating medium tends to promote prosperity and a contracting circulating medium means falling prices, and that demonstration made the Republican majority of a Senate committee yesterday consent to the elimination of a feature of their currency bill under which the banks could at will have contracted our national paper currency. Now, I believe that the volume of the circulating medium is the actual money plus the credit currency plus the bank credits of the country, convertible instantly into money, and any policy that takes away either of these destroys prosperity.

If you had had the courage that ought to attend power, and the wisdom that ought to attend authority, the statesmanship that ought to meet opportunity and demand, you would have long since given the country a sound banking system, under which no man could fear for the safety of his deposits, and the present panic could never have occurred. Had you done so you could have continued to denounce the Democratic party for the panic of 1893. And so great is the natural wealth, the boundless resources, and productive genius of our people and country that we as a people would have continued to prosper in spite of the tribute of $160,000,000 annually you make us pay to the American steel trust and the unnumbered millions to others of the favored classes under a system of laws designed to fatten the few and enslave the many. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Instead of courage, instead of statesmanship, what did you do? Nothing. And what do you present us now? The Aldrich bill. I shall not discuss it much. Its advocates declare it only a makeshift, a patch. It adds more links to that endless chain that may be used to draw gold from the National Treasury for the benefit of Wall street on occasion. It provides still further to destroy the safety of the general depositor by absorbing the assets or tying up the assets of the banks for a speculative and peculative currency when it is issued. It extends and enlarges all the evils of the present system. It does not cure or ameliorate one evil. It does not strengthen, but weakens every bank that touches its favors. It does not meet or prevent or intend to meet or prevent any future panic. It pretends to intend to furnish an elastic currency. It only pretends, for no bank would ever use it except for sinister purposes or in desperate conditions. Except that Congress it looked to to do something, it would not stand a ghost of a show to pass. We want and need no greater volume of currency to-day than we have. We have more than ever before, and these banks could, but would not take out more. The gold supply is growing with our growth. What we need is a safe place to put it, and thereby multiply its beneficent power for credit expansion and for increasing the volume of circulation. You have forced the banks to do practically all their business with the average individual by the book and deposit system, and then not only failed to require good security for the deposits, but have taken away what security might have existed, not only by taking in pledge their property in bonds to secure the bank notes, but by putting in banks for their own use the deposits of the Government's money without interest and taking the other assets of the banks to secure the Government for this voluntary advancement, while to the depositors you leave the leavings. In business, when one lends to a failing debtor and takes special pledge to secure him, to the detriment of the general creditor, the pledge is void, but under the present system and under the Aldrich bill you propose for the Government to do that very thing, and in effect you will lend banks the Government credit and money to promote speculative gambling, while you destroy the safety of the deposits of the great common people. But enough of the Aldrich bill.

The Fowler bill is different, and if the United States to-day were without a banking system or a paper currency, it would appeal to me strongly; but thrust on us now, even if the public did not mistrust it, I fear it would contract the currency in a dangerous degree and bring about the falling prices and hard times that go with a decreasing circulation, such as we had in all the eighties. Unjust, unfair, or unnatural contraction is no less to be feared and prevented than unjust, unfair, or unnatural expansion. It is true our standard is gold, and gold is the standard of the credits, but when the Government has put forth a permanent fixed paper currency, which in every respect is practically the equivalent of gold, does it not become equally with actual gold the basis or base of our credit system? The United States Treasury notes and bank bond-secured notes are such a fixed currency. And to retire them as fast as they could be retired under the Fowler bill would be an experiment of danger, if not of certain disaster. His answer to that is, perhaps, that they would be replaced by the credit currency notes of the banks, but that I doubt. The banks could under his bill issue credit notes to the amount of $4,000,000,000 if all our silver and gold were destroyed save $1,000,000,000, but would they? And if they did, would these notes command implicit trust of the people? I have never believed in the quantitative theory of money except in a relative sense. It is immaterial at any given date or time whether the entire money of the world, gold being the standard, amounts to one sum or another—that is, one hundred million or one million ounces of gold—if you could separate that date or time from all preceding time. Each commodity would be priced in gold under the same terms and would stand relatively to each other just the same, whether the gold supply were great or small. But all the world having debits and credits, and the mind and commerce of the world being adjusted to the present money volume, any sudden or even steady, but great, increase or decrease of that volume would have far-reaching effect. The gentleman from New Jersey wisely objects to a central bank, and few, I think, will seriously consider it. Eliminating the proposition to retire all bank notes and greenbacks and silver, there is left only of Mr. FOWLER'S bill as to banking the proposition to allow banks under rigid rules and inspection or supervision and system of organization and security to issue its credit notes to bearer and its deposit certificate to the special individual with equal and absolute guaranty of redemption. Now, I do not care much for the credit note to bearer, in fact, at this time, at least it would be dangerous, but I believe that if some plan is adopted making the bank's book credits absolutely safe commerce will take care of the details and perfect the bank-credit system. And furthermore, if the depositors' guaranty were ever incorporated in the banking system and it was found that the needs of commerce required the credit-note issue, that would surely follow.

There is no reason in equity or justice why any bank note should be more safe than any bank deposit. There is a possible reason in equity why the depositor should me more safe, because by depositing it in banks he lends his money to commerce and helps to turn the wheels while by taking it out in currency or gold he withdraws it and locks the wheels of industry, but both should be and can be made safe. A system with safe currency and unsafe deposits is lopsided and for a great nation inexcusable.

Why not, then, take a plan like Oklahoma's? The machinery and means of governing banks and providing a sufficient guaranty fund, provided in the Williams bill or the Oklahoma plan, may be all that is needed. I think it is, but if the principle be adopted the details will follow and be worked out. I believe the banks whose deposits are guaranteed should be commercial banks only and should never be allowed to pay over 2 per cent or some small interest on deposits. Savings banks and trust companies' customers should look out for themselves; they have made an investment. The object of the bank act being strictly on the paternal line and to provide only a safe depository for money in keeping with the principle and the necessity under which the Government assumes and exercises the right to coin money, it ought not to seek to cover other fields. It has been and will be objected that for the Government to undertake to make depositors secure in their deposits is paternalism. I grant it in all fullness, but so is the act requiring banks to deposit Government bonds to secure the holders of its bank notes; so and every whit equally so is the requirement that banks should hold a reserve to protect their creditors. So is the double liability of stockholders. Every restriction, limitation, and requirement put upon banks to-day by law to protect the depositor, and every bank bill introduced here, is paternal. Any man or set of men have the unrestricted right by nature to open up a bank, receive deposits, issue certificates of deposit and their promisory notes. Why, then, should the Government make all these restrictions and requirements and tax the private bankers' notes 10 per cent except on the principle of paternalism and to protect the people or depositors? If the Government has the right to tax the private bank's note issue, which seems not denied, it would have just as much right to tax deposit certificates. No man is more opposed to paternalism generally than I, or to encouraging the citizen to look to his Government for aid in fighting the battles of life.

Every man must learn to stand alone, to make his own contracts, meet his own wants; but there are many great things the individual can not do effectively. He can not build his own university, he can not carry his own mail, he can not build his own road to market, he can not provide his own standards of weights and measures, or his own coins and standards of value well, though men have in a measure done all these things. But another says it is socialism. It would be socialism if one bank was made to pay the debt of another for the benefit of the failing bank, but that is not the case. Each bank is made to join in payment of the debts of a failed bank for the good of all the banks that do not fail and for the good of the public. Each bank is given by the public a great privilege, and must therefore submit itself to all the restrictions and burdens imposed with the grant. It is not bound to accept the grant. If you can adopt a hundred burdensome measures by which to make banks keep deposits secure, can not you add yet one more and impose a small tax? Is it socialism to make all the requirements now made of the banks to protect the public? Is not the safety of deposits a great public necessity as much so as a safe currency? As much so as coining the money? Ought not the people be given safety for their money on deposit equal to the old sock, the trunk, or the strong box, without the effect of the strong box in withdrawing it from circulation? Any measure that will prevent sudden and great disaster to the whole public such as came upon us lately should be studied long before it is cast aside. The public schools have some taint of socialism. I think far more than the proposition to assess banks for security of depositors. For a long time good men and true opposed them because they taxed you to school my child, and you have no option but to be taxed. The reasoning looks sound, but a great and overwhelming cry arose. Humanity cried out for the poor in appeal to our charity, but a higher authority appealed to the lawmaker and for the protection of the public against the vice and crime of the ignorant. The rich are required to pay for the poor, not as charity, but for public and self-protection. A great necessity is upon us. Governments that adopt the central and branch banking system as we once did are not in this trouble, because all their banks are jointly liable. A central bank system is a system that assesses all banks to pay any failure, but we can not and would not adopt that, because we fear, and justly fear, its power; but the necessity for safety is with us as it is with France, Germany, and England. Over one-third of the great mass of bills introduced bear testimony to that fact, and, containing a guaranty plan, show that the people know their needs.

Even the distinguished gentleman, Mr. HILL of Connecticut, declares the guaranty proposition of Mr. WILLIAMS by voluntary acceptance could be had, but he says the banks will not accept it. I say they will. Let us pass that law. If they do not accept it no harm is done. The law is a dead letter. If they do accept, the law is good. The gentleman says no man can give a reason why banks more than life insurance companies should mutually insure each other's policies, but he is mistaken. Life-insurance companies are not bound together. The failure of one does not affect them all, and if there were no life-insurance companies, commerce would still prosper and maybe so equally well. Banks are a vast interdependent system, willing or unwilling. But in times of panic now, as he says, each pulls apart and strives to save itself, but if they had mutual guaranty they would pull together, as they sometimes do even now when they think deeply and wisely. He tells of rich men now getting control of a chain of banks and riding them at their will unrestrained. It could not be done if all banks were linked together under proper laws. Governor Hughes has proposed additional limitations on banks loaning to each other's officers. On all sides come suggestions to make more safe the banking system and the bank depositors. Once for all, it should be accepted that banking as well as currency is a public or quasi public function and safe banks a public necessity. We have reached a point where the very public safety demands that the Government, in the interest of the whole people, see to it that the "state," the people, "take no harm." In the vast intricacies of commercial life depositors are hardly volunteer creditors. Deposits can scarcely be avoided, or if they could all business would be blocked; and yet in panic in the great city of New York one bank was as safe or unsafe as another. But why guarantee the depositors against the banks and not the bank against the depositor, says the gentleman. Surely the gentleman has thrown dust in his own eyes by his logical pyrotechnics. Why, sir, did the Government impose double liability? Why try in other ways to protect deposits? The bank loans on security, deliberately, voluntarily, and for a profit to one who has no duty to perform to the bank or to the public. No Government protection or inspector is needed or desired by the banks to aid or protect them in their loans. All Government restrictions on bank loans are made to protect the bank's creditor. Then with my earnest and able colleague from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] he strikes the wildest note of all when he says, first, that safety of deposits is very desirable, and next that guaranty of depositors or guaranty of deposits would promote an era of wild and unsafe banking.

Surely the depositor being guaranteed, the banker would feel no less desirous of protecting his own interest, and other bankers being likewise interested would be no less observant of their brother banker's conduct. The gentleman from Connecticut wants the United States to deposit its money but take security. Why? Because he wants Government money safe. As for me I had rather secure the savings and pennies of the poor than the surplus millions of the United States. How is it everyone wants to make United States deposits secure but not the common depositor? Is it simply because the Government is big enough and strong enough to demand it and the people can not help themselves? My colleague [Mr. BURGESS] has made a speech on this subject well worth perusal. Like so many others he falls into the use of the shiboleth, "emergency currency," some currency that will come when the crops ripen and go away when they are sold; and they seem to want this issued by the Government direct to banks or by the Government through the banks on a special deposit of security. Most advocates of the emergency currency have convinced themselves at least that every fall for the last ten years before the panic the country was on the verge of panic and escaped by a miracle, and that without their emergency currency we will verge some more every fall, and only escape by a miracle every fall until we do provide it. Now, I do not believe at all in this recurring miracle. I do not believe there was any more approach to a panic in the fall of 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905, than there was of failure of the Bank of France. In 1906 there were clouds but they did not hover over any question kin to emergency currency. All during the spring of 1907 the clouds grew darker, and the East was borrowing from South and West. We had, or the banks had, the power to issue several hundred millions of currency of the kind these gentlemen urge—that is, secured currency, but it would not "emerge." It did not emerge when it was needed, nor would the Aldrich currency. I know it is considered, or said to be not decorum to speak of measures in the other branch, but I see no sense in that decorum. The wise men have told us that our present bank currency has a habit of emerging in the summer and retiring in the fall when the crop-moving banks call for it, and so Mr. BURGESS wants a commission to tell what is the matter. He is right this far. If we do not know anything we ought to do, appoint a commission, and they will do nothing and take a long time about it, and we can tell the people we have done something, and the people must wait. The commission of Mr. BURGESS is to gather up a mess of opinions and theories, such as we all have received in our mail, and will argue from many sides learnedly and long, as bankers have in conventions, but discover no essential fact not now known, and when this stress is over for the time the people will forget the commission.

It is only better than the Aldrich bill because it does nothing, no harm. It leaves the patient to live over his present attack by his natural strength, and does not weaken his system by the injection of more poison to make him less able to stand another attack. The high statesmanship of Messrs. BURGESS and HILL reaches the lofty conclusion that neither they, we, nor anyone else now know anything of the causes of this panic upon which to suggest any remedy. They father a school of silent wisdom that reminds one of the doctor who feels your pulse, looks wise, gives a bread pill, and tells you you have "periodical membratonitis" and slight "congestive emergiensis," and must wait further developments of the disease, in order to name it more specifically if you do not get well from the bread pill.

But further on, after urging a commission to tell us what to do, my colleague gets certain that we can do nothing; that we can not legislate values and credits and public confidence, nor do anything of good, but much of ill. Then why the commission? We have plenty of money, they say, and so do I. It is hoarded they say, and so do I, through fear of bank depositors, they say, and so do I. We can do nothing they say, and so do not I. We can pass laws that will make deposits safe and remove that fear. It took one panic to produce the law of specie resumption. It took another to bring about safe, sound currency, and it will take only one, I trust, to bring about a safe deposit and sound banking system. But if we do nothing now, we will do nothing later till a second panic compels it. I want to sum up, if I can, the various reasons against deposit guaranty. It is foolish, says my colleague, and doubtless he thinks so; but Mr. Bryan, Mr. Gage, Mr. FOWLER, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. CULBERSON, and the oldest, perhaps the best, at least the wealthiest banker of my town, and one of the best bankers of the town just south of me, and thousands of others think not. Let us let that be a stand off. But it would put in hodgepodge capacity and character with incompetency and rascality and lay a tax on all to protect the negligent depositor and rascally banker at the expense of the wise banker and careful depositor. I have partly answered this already. It is the cry of "paternalism," "socialism," made by the big and strong bank. It is the Gibraltar of the opposition to safe banking, sir. You do not throw capacity and incapacity into hodgepodge and tax both to support both. You bestow a privilege at a price. I maintain that 99 per cent of all deposits in commercial banks are involuntary, or placed without being influenced by question of safety in normal times. When high interest is offered by banks the depositor does and well may consider safety, but in all my life I never questioned the safety of any bank in my home town, yet deposited with only one. No bank depends alone or even largely on its safety in normal times to build up its business; they depend on friendship and business relations. That claim is hollow. In normal times 99 per cent of all banks are safe, and those that are not are as apt as not to be some old and trusted institution. Of the three biggest failures I recall in my State, two were old and trusted, one was new; all stood on their character and competency, without the paternal and socialistic inspection, regulation, or restriction.

I maintain that there is not a bank in existence that would not itself be more benefited by the safe guaranty of the deposits of all banks than it would be burdened by the tax, and these gentlemen must abandon their proposition or follow it to its logical end—free and unrestricted banking. They must stand for free bank notes, wild-cat bank notes, and deposits unprotected by reserve or double liability or other restrictions, or come with us to safe bank notes and safe-deposit obligations. The law says to every bank to-day, For the protection of all other banks and all the public you shall not give your note without making it secure (a great infraction of freedom), but you may receive all the deposits you please and promise all you please to the certain individual without making him secure. The note, you say, of each bank is secured by that bank alone, while this proposes that all banks shall make each deposit sure. I grant it; but I charge that in the present method of securing the note you have tied up an equal or greater amount of the resources of the banks issuing, and the notes issued are not issued on principles of banking at all, but are in effect an issue of Government notes. You have destroyed all real bank-note issue, and I charge that no real bank-note issue was ever safely made except on terms amounting to mutual and joint guaranty by many banks, as in the case of all central and branch banks or Government banks. The truth is, and we know it, our present bank notes are guaranteed by the Government, are Government notes. The Government devised a plan to make itself safe on these and prohibited all other. And all issuing banks jointly bear the expense of the system, whether they need inspection and restriction or not. Some are honest and capable and some are not, but all pay this expense and bear these restrictions and burdens, and this is what is proposed in the guaranty of deposits. "But," says my colleague, "it is the inalienable right of every individual in this country to get all the premium that character and capacity give him * * * and if he goes into the banking business he is a candidate for deposits." Why, then, do you forbid a solvent bank to issue its promise to bearer on his character? The truth is, commercial banks should no more be allowed to receive deposits, without condition, limitation, or security, than to issue notes, and the right to impose these restrictions, limitations, and conditions is as clear in one case as in the other. We recognize this truth partly, but not wholly, as we ought.

Free banking means free notes and unsafe notes, free deposits and unsafe deposits, free competition and unsafe competition for deposits and for loans and for lending, with all kinds of interest paid to depositors, all kinds of security or no kind of security required of borrowers, and all kinds of risks taken by the banks; and any restrictions upon any of these inalienable rights are subject to all the invectives aimed by gentleman on this line against the guaranty of deposits. It is a great thrust to call a measure "socialistic," "paternal," but gentlemen must learn that no government is or can be free from all paternalism and all socialism. All government is compromise. All antitrust legislation may be socialistic, all public service laws, all protective tariff laws are paternal. Very many laws are one or the other or both. The true doctrine is to preserve to the individual all and every particle of liberty and individualism which it is not absolutely necessary to take away from him for the general good, and, in preserving this, I go as far as any man, but I would not go back now to the private schools, to wild-cat banks, to the repeal of all labor laws, to unrestricted hours of contract labor and child labor. Society has learned that the blow of the bludgeon is not the only means by which the strong strike down the weak and has banded itself together under a growing and higher law which guards and shields, protects and even helps the weak, the innocent and helpless, against the cunning and the strong. The statesman's task is to do all this and still build up the nobler man and give to the individual a high and still higher prize for personal genius and high emprise. But it is claimed that guaranty of national-bank deposits would create a panic, depositors in other banks rushing to guaranteed banks. Surely gentlemen have lost their balance when they object to a system because it might be so much better than all other systems that all other systems would vanish because of their weakness. Some gentlemen have a nightmare. Guaranteed banks would pay all kinds of interest and bid for unlimited deposits on the regular get-rich-quick plan. So would banks have done as to their practically Government guaranteed notes if the Government had permitted, but the Government did not permit it, and even supposing that a bank, because its deposits were guaranteed, ceased therefore to be honest and ceased to care for its own interest as a bank, still no one has offered to give any such privileges to the guaranteed banks, but all provide for limitations of interest rates and for even closer limitations and restrictions, inspection, and reserves than those under which banks now move. Gentlemen seem to fancy that the proposition is simply to assess all banks for the guaranty of all deposits and then turn all banks over to free lawlessness. Surely these gentlemen have neither read any of the bills introduced nor taken counsel of their own great wisdom, when they think that Congress in providing the one great safeguard would throw away all the other safeguards and the banker throw away all the care that the experience of a century has shown to be necessary to safe banking. Mr. Gage says the only restraint upon officers of banks really is the fear of loss, not to his depositors, but to his stockholders.

But these objections are answered so fully in the excerpt from the Springfield Republican, I will ask the Clerk to read it.

PROTECTING DEPOSITORS AS WELL AS NOTE HOLDERS.

[Springfield (Mass.) Republican.]

James B. Forgan, of the National City Bank of Chicago, has been quoted by William J. Bryan and others as having said in opposition to the policy of Government or joint guaranty of bank deposits that "it would make all banks safe, one just as good as another, and for that reason a man would go to any bank with his money." In an open letter to Bryan the banker says he never expressed himself in such terms. What he has said is that the plan would reduce all bankers to the same level, and there would be no reason why anyone should discriminate between one bank and another in making deposits, and he proceeds to observe:

"In my judgment the Government's guaranty would gradually but inevitably reduce the high standing and credit of the strong, conservative, and well-managed banks to the level of the weak, speculative, and poorly managed. * * * The rascal is invited to become a banker and to cover himself with a mantle of credit which otherwise it would be quite impossible for him to acquire, and which is provided for him by and at the expense of all the good banks of the country. This would not be a square deal. It would put dishonesty and reckless banking at a premium and remove from the banker all ambition to excel in his profession and to acquire that good name which Solomon says 'is rather to be chosen than great riches.'"

This is, of course, quite a different view from that which has been accredited to him, and it presents considerations which are to be given weight.

Yet the fact is to be admitted that the purpose of the existing national-banks act is to "make all banks safe"—to reduce them all to a dead level of equality, so far as the safety of depositors as well as note holders is concerned. Special security is accorded the note holders, as is generally regarded as proper, but the Government also undertakes to look after the safety of the depositor. When the bank act was under amendment in Congress back in the sixties, the mention was made to strike out the 100 per cent liability of stockholders on the ground that, as the note holders were amply secured by the Government bonds back of the notes, it was no business of the Government to look after the depositors. But the proposed amendment had no suport worth mentioning. It was considered that the Government should also provide for the safety of depositors, and this it undertakes to do, not only through enforcement of double liability upon stockholders, but through frequent Government examinations of the banks and through various restrictions of law upon loans, and so on.

Thus the question raised by the Government or joint bank guaranty of deposits is one involving no departure in fundamental principle from existing policy. It is a question simply whether the Government shall support its present purpose of protecting depositors with measures which may prove certainly effective, instead of indifferently effective, as is the case under existing law. We venture to say simply that this is a question not to be dismissed by a wave of the hand, but deserving of careful consideration. That bankers who have built up a reputation for integrity and conservatism should object to the proposed change is of course natural, but their attitude is to be accepted as no more weighty against the suggested reform than it would be against any and all policies of Government regulation of banks. Considered as an ordinary and highly competitive business, something might be said in favor of removing all public regulations from banking. Then all the more would honest and conservative bankers rise above their fellows and draw public confidence to themselves.

But the country has accepted the policy of close public regulation, after some experience with the let-alone policy before the civil war, and it will never go back to the policy of no regulation, no matter how much the regulative policy tends to reduce banking and bankers to a dead level of safety and general conduct. As a matter of fact, however, bankers would still find, under the deposit-guaranty plan, large room for the exercise of judgment and of an ambition to excel. Their first ambition now is to make their institutions large and also profitable to stockholders, and deposit guaranty would not materially affect the situation in this respect; while by creating in every bank a substantial interest in the sober conduct of other banks, the plan must result in a general improvement rather than in a deterioration in banking methods.

It is remarkable that all those who oppose the guaranteeing of deposits have found but one other means or suggestion of safety, and that is the central bank, which all fear, and which, besides, is a mutual guaranty in another form. Some who do not oppose the mutual guaranty, as far as I know, suggest the postal savings bank for the people. Doubtless a postal savings bank will appeal to many. Surely it will if some means is not found to clothe our banks with absolute safety and give to the people absolute trust in them. They will say about their deposits what they have said about their currency: "We will trust the Government." But even postal savings banks must further diminish the safety of the common bank deposit if such savings are redeposited with banks by the Government on special security in accordance with its present custom of making deposits. Postal savings banks would enter the Federal Government into a business line of at least doubtful constitutionality; would bring the Government in competition with its own people in business in a new field; would increase the number of Federal employees; increase the patronage of the party in power, and all for an unnecessary purpose if some other means of safety can be had for the depositor. Postal savings banks are absolutely safe. All the people know it, and if you do not succeed in guaranteeing bank deposits, postal savings banks will be established.

The leaders of the Democratic party have agreed upon a policy of deposit guaranty contained in the Williams bill, which may not be free from fault. It is voluntary, which, in my opinion, was unnecessary, but while that feature answers an objection, it will not, I think, in practice defeat the purpose or even cripple the measure, as all banks that may will gladly accept the provisions. It provides for liquidating the assets of failed banks before payment of depositors. This I think a serious defect which ought to be cured. It provides what it calls an "emergency currency," but what is in reality scarcely, if anything, more than a provision by which the central government is substituted for central reserve city banks, and holds for the individual banks that part of their reserve heretofore permitted to be placed in reserve banks, and the Government, instead of reserve banks, pays this portion of its reserve back to the individual bank in time of need.

The party or man or set of men who shall cause the establishment of a banking system which, without putting the Government into the banking business, will make every deposit as safe as every bank note is to-day will deserve and receive the thanks of all banks and the blessings of the people.

For the want of some safe place of deposit for the people's money, which would not take it all out of circulation, this panic has come upon us, and after all and as usual the plain people have suffered most. The cotton of my country has fallen $20 per bale, or, say, what was in their hands, in the aggregate $100,000,000. Other products of labor, I assume, in proportion. Hundreds of thousands of laborers of every class are idle and the wages of the employed have gone down, but the price of living has not gone down. Tariff-protected and trust-protected commodities glut no markets. Lumber mills and steel plants shut down; their production ceases; their employees may tramp or beg or starve. The price of their product must be upheld. The worst of the calamity for this time, we hope, is passed, but can we provide against its return? We can. Then, will we do it? This panic is an indictment against the party in power in that, with the richest and greatest country on earth, it provided a bank system which was a stupendous failure. And that failure with an overflowing National Treasury, the greatest volume of money in all our history, and boundless riches in harvest, mine, and factory, produced a crash which Senator ALDRICH describes. Let me read his words:

Mr. President, the financial crisis from which the country has just emerged, which culminated in a serious panic in October, was the most acute and destructive in its immediate consequences of any which has occurred in the history of the country. The country was saved, by the narrowest possible margin, from an overwhelming catastrophe, whose blighting effect would have been felt in every household.

Although the total collapse was avoided, yet the injury to business amounted to thousands of millions of dollars.

He also declares that the most powerful aid to prevent the catastrophe was the clearing-house certificates, a violation of law and an aid which he thinks could not be used again. He also says, and truly, that the happy situation of an overflowing—and he might have added complaisant—treasury may not coincide with another panic. To do nothing now, or worse than nothing, is criminal. Making all bank notes safe was a great benefit to the people, a greater benefit to the banks. Making all deposits safe will be a great benefit to the banks, but a greater benefit to the people. We swallow the camel when necessary to aid great banks and financiers, but distinguished gentlemen never prone to balk at paternalism raise hands in holy horror and cry "paternalism" when it is proposed to make the people's money safe. If this Government is great and wise, we will never again hear of a long line of weak and helpless men and women pleading in vain for their pennies at the window of a broken national bank. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, in extending my remarks I wish to include in the RECORD two letters from the bankers I have referred to—one from W. L. Murphey, of Mexia, Tex., a successful banker of more than twenty years' standing; the other from James Garrity, of Corsicana, Tex., the oldest and perhaps most eminent and successful banker of my home town; also parts of an article written by Gen. A. B. Nettleton, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury:

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
Mexia, Tex., December 3, 1907.

Hon. RUFUS HARDY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 29th ultimo in reply to mine of a previous date. You ask me what I think of the Bryan proposition as to bank deposits being guaranteed by the Government. His ideas and mine agree on general lines, but I am not in favor of the "assessment" idea, but much prefer a straight tax annually based on the capital of each national bank, and if such tax or taxes should not at any time be sufficient to pay creditors of failed or suspended banks, then the "assessment" to make up the deficiency would be all right. For the first year or two it might be necessary to have an assessment, but my idea is that within a few years, say, from two to five years, the fund created by a straight tax would be much larger than would be necessary to pay creditors or depositors in failed banks. As I wrote you before, national banks now pay a tax on one-fourth of 1 per cent per annum on their circulation. This tax is really an unnecessary tax, so far as the Government really needs it. Abolish this tax and in lieu thereof tax national banks, say, one-fourth of 1 per cent on their capital stock at the start and as the fund grows larger then Congress at some future time could reduce the tax to, say, one-eighth of 1 per cent per annum. I never was much on "assessments," but prefer to know what is coming, to the exact amount, in the way of a tax, and "cut my cloth accordingly." I believe the tax plan as outlined would be far more satisfactory to the banks than the assessment plan would be.

Of course great opposition will develop to any plan presented by those that do not want such a bill passed, and the cry of "class legislation" will be urged, etc., but even if it is class legislation in favor of national banks, still the other "classes"—the common people—will be far more benefited, for the reason that they will never lose one cent hereafter by reason of failed banks.

And another thing to consider in passing such a bill is that more money will be in the United States than ever before. It will come from every quarter of the globe to be deposited in banks whose system is the best and the safest in the world, when such a bill is passed, if ever it is passed. The United States will literally "run over at the top" with money. I sincerely hope Congress will act on the proposition at this term and create a banking bill that will be perfect, when depositors are protected. That is the only flaw now in the national-bank act. With that rectified, Uncle Sam can sit back and say that his system can not be beaten.

Excuse me for this long letter. As you write that the days do not seem over "two hours long," it will take you the best part of the day to read this letter.

Assuring you of my continued friendship and high regard, I remain,
Yours, truly,

W. L. MURPHY.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
Corsicana, Tex., March 9, 1908.

Hon. RUFUS HARDY, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: I have your favor of the 3d, and, in accordance with your request, I inclose herewith synopsis of my argument before the district bankers' convention at this place some time ago, which covers my views on the matter, though I have not taken the time to study up the details. I believe the matter is a very important one and that the people throughout the country will before long demand the absolute security of bank deposits.

With best wishes, I remain, very truly, yours,

JAS. GARITTY.

In saying that I heartily approve the guaranty or insurance of bank deposits, so that every bank in the country will be perfectly safe, so far as deposits are concerned, and that every depositor will feel and know to a certainty that he can get his money on demand from a sound or an unsound bank, those who know me and the concern that I represent will, I am sure, give me credit for not having any interested motive in advocating such guaranty. I do not know that it would be for the best interest of our bank, looking at the matter from the stockholders' standpoint alone, but I do believe that it would be greatly to the interest of the whole people, and the very best that could be done now or at any time for the prevention of panics.

The causes of our late panic have been fully discussed and ventilated in the papers and magazines, and, as usual, have created much difference of opinion among the various writers. But I assert, without fear of valid refutation, that the only thing that has or ever will cause a panic is the fear of the depositor that he will not be able to get his money when he demands it. If you satisfy him absolutely that he can get it on demand he will never withdraw any except for actual needs, and all bankers know that such demand can always be met with very little cash. A number of objections have been raised by men of high financial stand to the guaranteeing of bank deposits, but you will generally find that the objections come from those who deem themselves so strong that they will be able to control the bulk of the business that ordinarily would and should go to weaker rivals.

Their way of attack is to put up a straw man or plan that no one advocates and then proceed to demolish him. They say, for instance, that rascals would be invited to become bankers and will be enabled to cover themselves with a mantle of credit that they could not otherwise acquire, and they make this statement as if those who favor the guaranty of bank deposits advocate the same without providing for the proper regulation of the business. I am as much opposed as anyone to the guaranty of bank deposits until such safeguards are thrown around the business as will reduce to a minimum the opportunity of the dishonest to take advantage of such guaranty. We have always had rascals in all lines of business and always will, but the law can easily be so framed so that the number under the guaranteed plan will be less than heretofore instead of greater. In addition to the laws and regulations covering national and other banks at present, and such as may hereafter be found necessary, I would add the following:

First. Strict and frequent examination by expert examiners.

Second. Insured banks to pay no interest on deposits.

Third. Deposits to never exceed from six to ten times the capital paid in.

Fourth. Total amount of loans or investments of any kind not to exceed from six to ten times the capital paid in.

Fifth. Total reserve to be kept at home.

This would, I believe, make our banking system the strongest and best in the world, and since there would be but few, if any, failures, the cost of maintaining it would be insignificant. I am only outlining a general plan and do not presume to say that I have studied out all the details, for I have not had time to do so, and I do not believe that the party in power or the large moneyed institutions that control it are prepared to permit the enactment of such a law in the near future. If, however, several of the States should pass the guaranty law, the Central Government will, I believe, be forced to do the same, else national banks will be placed at a disadvantage compared with State banks whose deposits are insured. If deposits are fully secured there will, I feel sure, be no more money panics and no piling up of money in the large centers of business, which is often done for the purpose of furnishing money to gamblers on the stock exchange.

It occurs to me that the insurance or guaranty of bank deposits is the only remedy that has been proposed for the prevention of panics, such as we have just passed through. The Aldrich bill, for emergency currency, or the American Bankers' Association plan for asset currency, a large central bank, etc., are, in my opinion, mere makeshifts, and unnecessary now or at any time. With deposits absolutely secure we have all the currency that we need now or are likely to need for some time to come. A run upon a bank is the only thing that ever has or ever will start a panic, and if deposits were fully insured there would be no run upon a bank, and, of course, no panics. Money panics affect all business and all people, and though they may be but short lived so far as the actual demand for cash is concerned, the bad effects of it on all business is general, and often lasts for years. To my mind it is extreme selfishness on the part of large and strong banks to object to the absolute security of all banks, for the reason, they say, that it would reduce all banks to a level—the weak and incompetent the same as the strong and well managed. As a matter of fact, it does not do so, though the security be absolute so far as small banks are concerned, the large one will always have the advantage of large capital and deposits, and loaning large amounts of money. Banks make their money out of depositors, and they should certainly be willing and glad to pay the small amount that it would take to absolutely secure them. Forty-odd years of experience with national banks goes to show that it would require about one-twentieth of 1 per cent of the average deposits to pay the losses of all insolvent banks, and with such improvements as we would have in the law, and regulation of our banks under the guaranty plan, it would cost practically nothing. No bank or individual should be allowed to do a banking business unless they were willing and able to furnish absolute security for the depositors. And I believe that the business of a bank should be in a measure confined to the locality in which the bank has its headquarters, or at least this should be the case so far as small banks are concerned, and if they are only allowed to hold and use the amount of deposits proportioned to their capital, it will necessarily be so.

Some who object to the insurance of bank deposits declare that it is rank communism, when, as a matter of fact, the Government of the United States, under the present national-bank law, does to some extent guarantee depositors—such as the 100 per cent liability of shareholders, restricting loans to 10 per cent of capital and surplus, amount of reserve to be held at all times, examination by expert accountants, and frequent statements published under oath. All of these things help to guarantee the depositors, and they are all paid for by the banks just as the full guaranty would be paid for. If the national banks did not have the safeguards above named they would be no better than a private institution, and people would not have the confidence that they have in them. Any man with a thimbleful of sense should be able to frame a law that would make all banks absolutely safe, and surely none will deny that this is desirable. The trouble, and the only trouble, about the general agreement as to the insurance of bank deposits is because the kings and princes of finance do not believe that it is to their interest that all banks should be absolutely safe so far as deposits are concerned. On the contrary, they want the public to believe that they only are safe and thereby attract from a distance the money that should be kept near home. But we know from late experience that big names and big capital alone will not insure honest management and absolute security; but insurance will. During the height of the late panic reputation and large capital counted for little. You had to put up or shut up. Everyone was from Missouri. Whenever the largest and best of our institutions put the lid on they were looked upon with more or less suspicion, and, if the truth must be told, banks were as much afraid of each other as depositors were afraid of them. They tell us that it is communistic to tax good banks for the faults and ignorance of the bad ones; but if this is so, why do we tax ourselves to provide police force to protect us against crime, also taxes for schools, roads, canals, and so forth. Surely these things are just as communistic as the tax on banks to secure the people who provide them with the funds out of which they make their living.

GUARANTY OF DEPOSITS MOVEMENT EXPLAINED—DEMAND OF PEOPLE AND PRESS DISCUSSED IN DETAIL—PLAN FOR LEGISLATION BY CONGRESS TO PROVIDE INSURANCE OF MONEY DEPOSITED IS OUTLINED.

[Gen. A. B. Nettleton, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in Review of Reviews.]

The proposition to provide some general form of protection for bank depositors against loss from bank failures is not new, not suddenly born of recent fright and disaster. Certain experiments in this field were made in the remote past, but under conditions so crude as to furnish no useful basis of judgment. During the last dozen years a number of well-informed writers on financial subjects in the United States, including several practical bankers, have presented and advocated fairly well-digested plans to this end. In 1899 such a measure lacked but two or three votes of enactment by the legislature of Kansas. A group of about 100 State banks doing business in Georgia and Florida have a mutual depositors' guaranty fund of moderate amount, which is held in trust-bearing interest. The chartered banks of Mexico have long maintained a voluntary league among themselves, under the practical working of which all come to the aid of each in time of peril, whether from internal or external cause, with the result that no such bank has failed, and hence no depositor has suffered loss since the system was adopted under the advice of President Diaz.

The unprecedented business experience through which the American people have passed since September last has, like a flash of financial lightning in the night, revealed an amazing situation which commands universal attention. In the resulting earnest and widespread discussion of remedies for a condition which all concede to be intolerable, the hitherto neglected suggestion of bank-deposit insurance has, with apparent suddenness, acquired much prominence. The result is a very considerable and apparently increasing demand that some systematic and effective protection shall be thrown around bank deposits, not for the benefit and safety of depositors only but of the banks themselves and indirectly of the entire community as well.

OKLAHOMA'S PIONEER SYSTEM.

The pioneer action of Oklahoma has created wide interest. The deposit-insurance law of that State, enacted in December last and now in operation, provides for the simplest form of compulsory bank-deposit insurance by the banks themselves, the State assuming no pecuniary responsibility or risk. Periodical assessments are to be levied by the State on all banks in proportion to their average deposits for the previous year. The proceeds constitute the so-called "bank deposit guaranty fund," which is held in the custody of the State treasurer. As often as a bank fails all depositors are immediately paid in full from the guaranty fund. The State bank commissioner then liquidates the affairs of the failed bank, and from the proceeds of assets and from further assessments, if necessary, on the banks the guaranty fund is kept intact. The law provides a number of novel safeguards for the banking business of the State. For example, whenever the State bank commissioner obtains satisfactory proof that any bank officer or employee is dishonest, reckless, or incompetent, he may require and compel his resignation or his removal by the directors.

This law was passed by a nearly unanimous and wholly nonpartisan vote in the legislature, and with the apparent approval of the people generally.

THE BANKS AND THEIR DEPOSITORS.

The case in favor of the deposit-guaranty plan naturally starts by pointing out what is held to be the central and fatal defect of our otherwise excellent banking system, a defect which demands an immediate and effective remedy if we are to continue to do business.

Our complex and colossal business fabric rests upon the banks of the country; in turn, the banks depend for their solvency and continued usefulness upon a theoretical mutual confidence between themselves and their depositors, which in fact only exists during prosperous times, but suddenly disappears when needed in times of stress, and is replaced with keen mutual distrust and a destructive competitive scramble for currency, constituting the moving cause of all our severe financial panics.

Speaking broadly, 24,000 banks in the United States—national, State, and private—borrow in the form of deposits practically all the money the people possess and from time to time control, except that which they carry on the person or privately hoard. This huge volume of money, which is the commercial lifeblood of the country, is, with unimportant exceptions, thus borrowed by the banks with the agreement that it shall be repaid in cash on demand. Aside from certain Government and interbank deposits, the banks give no security in return, no evidence of the loan thus made to them save a memorandum entry by a bank clerk in a passbook held by the depositor.

By thus borrowing practically all of the people's cash and large additional aggregates of credit values, quite unnecessary to discuss here, they become plain debtors to their depositors in 1907 in the total sum of more than $13,000,000,000—an amount which is incomprehensible by any except statistical experts, and fivefold greater than all the real money, gold, silver, and paper in the country. These deposits, these sums borrowed by the banks from the men, women, and corporations of the United States, become legally the absolute property of the respective banks receiving them. In the absence of statutory limitation, which does not now exist, any bank may thus lawfully borrow, returnable on demand, twice, thrice, ten times the amount of its own paid-in capital, and then proceed to lend practically 75 per cent of the whole on the time notes, secured and unsecured, of business men and concerns, and partly on other evidences of debt. Thus they put beyond their reach, for periods ranging from thirty days to six months, a very large part of the entire volume of borrowed money, nearly all of which, as stated, they have agreed to return to depositors on demand and without previous notice. This situation is noteworthy. Obviously such a business policy, with its vast inverted pyramid of bank indebtedness, could only be justified as to its safety and practicability by the existence of some saving law of nature or of economics whose operation is certain and universal. Does such a law exist?

RECIPROCAL CONFIDENCE NECESSARY.

Here is the crux of the matter: If by courtesy the present banking system can be said to have a foundation, it consists of first, an unthinking confidence on the part of average depositors, numbering millions of all classes, vocations, and degrees of intelligence, that their money can be and always will be repaid on demand according to the bank's contract to that end; and, second, the confidence of bankers, supposed to be based on ascertained economic laws, that in practice and under the rule of averages only a modern rate and safe percentage of their depositors will ever in fact demand payment at the same time.

These twin assumptions, of depositors on the one hand and of bankers on the other, are manifestly reciprocal and interdependent. The soundness of the one would assure the soundness of the other; the collapse of one would explode the other, and the combination would be in ruins. What is the fact shown by a well-illumined line of experience? Only one answer can be given or attempted—the financial catamaran sails admirably in fair business weather; in times of tempest it goes to pieces absolutely.

COLLAPSE OF CONFIDENCE IN TIMES OF PANIC.

If, prior to the month of October, in the year of grace 1907, there was any doubt that our existing banking system has no other ultimate basis than the quicksand of twin fallacies herein referred to, and that it requires radical and immediate reform, that doubt has been rudely and effectively removed by the conclusive logic of events. Without warning, without precedent, without authority of law, most of our 24,000 banks, including practically all of those in the large cities, simultaneously went out of business without closing their doors or going into liquidation; they abdicated their banking functions without surrendering their charters; they failed to meet their current sacred obligations to their depositors, including other banks as well as individuals, by refusing for weeks to pay their valid checks when presented.

THE BREAKDOWN LAST OCTOBER.

It goes without the saying that no such spectacle was ever before witnessed anywhere. If 10 or 10,000 leading and solvent merchants and manufacturers should treat their matured obligations as our banks thus treated their depositors' valid checks, which represented demand liabilities of the banks, they would straightway land in the bankruptcy courts. Apprehending trouble before it arrived, the banks simply took the start of their demand creditors, including sister banks and individual depositors, and audaciously assumed the risk involved in heading off a strike of depositors by first themselves calling a strike against depositors. They feared that depositors, having lost confidence, were about to make heavier withdrawals than many banks could stand, and so adopted the only alternative that occurred to them.

Undoubtedly the immediate result of this financial coup was greatly beneficial, but the occurrence creates a situation and entails a responsibility which will probably give the nation little financial repose until it is met, and met in a right manner. The situation created is this: The phenomenal action of the banks, however effective in stemming one rising panic, was, of course, revolutionary in the sense that it was subversive of fundamental commercial ethics and time-honored banking practice, and constitutes a precedent which, if followed, must quickly produce universal financial chaos and disaster.

Is that precedent to be followed, and what is there to prevent such a course? If hereafter, when public confidence falters and bad financial weather threatens, our banks, encouraged to do so by their recent lucky experience, may run to cover in a similar manner, it may prove that the nation's recent escape from a severe panic was purchased at too great cost. The only ground on which the recent action by bankers can be justified or excused is that they were attempting to do business under an antiquated banking system, which they found to be unworkable under test; that they now admit its complete breakdown and are ready to join the rest of the community in measures to produce a satisfactory and enduring remedy.

Only by meeting this situation and responsibility squarely and promptly, and thus removing all seeming necessity for and temptation toward a reception of last autumn's tactics, can the banks of the country avoid what they can little afford—a grievous loss of public confidence and esteem. The banks, by their concurrent action, have advertised the final collapse of the old banking system. They recognize that its one fatal weakness is its dependence in time of strain upon a mutual confidence between banks and their depositors, which never exists when trouble is present.

DEPOSITORS MUST HAVE ASSURANCES OF SECURITY.

The advocates of deposit insurance believe they propose a plan which will perfectly cure this weakness and make our banking system the best in the world—best both for the people and for the banks themselves. They further believe that any bank-reform legislation which stops at providing a so-called "emergency" currency, whether secured or unsecured, would have no appreciable good effect when panic conditions again arise, since the new currency would almost certainly be hoarded by banks and people as fast as issued, under the impulse of general fright, and the measure would thus resemble an attempt to resist a tornado with a feather. Nothing will prevent or greatly mitigate future panics of financial fear but absolute knowledge on the part of bank depositors that their money is safe.

The present system is a scourge to the banks themselves. Every panic reduces their net earnings by a large percentage and for a period of years. No one has more reason to dread a money panic than has the bank manager. To him, at least, it is purgatory.

The present impracticable banking system, especially since the panic of 1907, stimulates and tends to compel and render universal and permanent the evil habit of private hoarding, with its danger to property and life through robbery, its withdrawal of vast sums from the banks and the channels of business. Deposit insurance would remedy all this. It would bring out many millions of dollars from places of hiding and thus swell bank deposits and benefit the whole community. This gain alone would more than compensate the banks for their trifling contribution to the annual cost of deposit insurance.

Four simple questions without answers are suggestive: Has any general bank panic ever occurred in this country which did not come directly from a loss of confidence by bank depositors in the security of their funds? Has any general commercial panic or business revulsion ever occurred which did not owe its origin and severity to a bank panic? If all bank depositors were rendered permanently sure of the safety of their deposits, what causes could ever create anything approaching in importance and injury one of our general bank panics, with its resulting commercial collapse?

Already government, both national and State, has undertaken the duty of responsibility of regulating the banking business as a quasi public service and rendering it as honest and safe as practicable under the present faulty banking system. Deposit insurance is a logical broadening of that duty and responsibility in order, for the first time, to accomplish satisfactory results. The people must depend on government to compel a proper discharge of banking function in which lies their financial safety. The individual depositor is as helpless against money loss by bank failures as the individual passenger is against unnecessary railway wrecks.

It is a merit, rather than a fault, of the proposed change that it would render all banks equally sound and safe in the matter of deposits. That it would tend somewhat to lessen the overshadowing importance of the greatest banks and legitimately to increase the dignity and importance of the moderate-sized ones, would be rather a recommendation than a cause for criticism.

A judicious limitation placed by law upon the maximum amount of deposits which any bank should be permitted to accept (in other words, the maximum debt which it should be permitted to incur) in proportion to its unimpaired capital, and also upon the rate of interest which it should be allowed to pay on deposits and upon other like inducements to patronage, would effectively protect large and conservative banks from the unfair competition of dishonest or adventurous small ones. Besides, it is usually the high character and dependable personality of the men behind the bank which obtain and hold desirable patronage. Under a deposit-guaranty system flamboyant advertising and unbusinesslike inducements would not once in a thousand times attract or retain the custom of a depositor whose account was worth having.

Well-considered legislation providing for deposit insurance would naturally include other safeguards.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, during the past few months, in the recent but abandoned language of Republican leaders, "the country has been entering upon a new commercial era."

The American people are convinced that something is radically wrong with the business conditions of the country. This opinion has finally found lodgment in the minds of Republicans—an opinion, however, to which many of them seem reluctant to give full and candid expression.

The press reports the belligerent Senator from Ohio, in a recent speech relative to the state of affairs that has been pending, as saying:

All market values were affected. A decline began. In less than twelve months it amounted to an average of more than 33⅓ per cent of all railroad, industrial, and other stocks; a grand aggregate of more than $3,000,000,000.

Add to this huge sum several billions of dollars for shrinkage of other personalty and of realty, and we see some of the results of this panic.

In the total absence of any natural or other logical cause, the people naturally attribute the country's recent plight largely to fault in the administration of the Government's affairs—either to Congress's failure to enact wholesome legislation or to the pursuance of an unsound and unwise administrative policy by the executive department, or to both. Being in this state of mind, the American people are not content, are not prepared to see Congress meet and adjourn without devising some means of adequate relief and enacting it into law.

If this Congress should prove to be a "do-nothing" instead of a "do-something" Congress, and so withholds from the country such remedial legislation as its present exigencies require, it is probable that upon our adjournment the nation will witness a depression of greater severity and more widespread proportions, if possible, than we have been experiencing.

REPUBLICAN DOCTRINE OF RESPONSIBILITY.

This grave problem addresses itself especially to the thoughtful and serious consideration of the Republican majority. For, the distinguished Speaker of this House, addressing the last national Republican convention, upon the subject of responsibility, said:

You know, under our form of government, the party in power is held responsible.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] voiced the same sentiment on this floor during the Fifty-ninth Congress when he said:

The Government has been Republican in all its branches. That party must stand and answer for whatever of good or bad has been accomplished.

In its national platform of 1896, the Republican party urged the election of its ticket as the only step necessary or available to secure prosperity.

Its national platform of 1900 solemnly declared that the country's prosperity was due to Republican control of the Government.

In its last national platform, the Republican party reminded the country that it had been in complete supremacy since 1897, and modestly assumed entire credit for whatever degree of prosperity then existed. Through its platforms, its partisan press, and its public speakers the doctrine has been constantly proclaimed and uniformly maintained that Republican administration is the sole agent of prosperity, to the exclusion of all other agencies or contributing causes.

Further emphasizing its position that responsibility for the country's prosperity or adversity rests alone upon the party in power, and taking advantage of the unfortunate coincidence of a panic during Cleveland's Administration, which was inherited from its predecessor, the Republican party, in its platform of 1896, affirmed that Democratic control of the Government had precipitated a panic, and therefore the Government should be rescued from that party's hands. In its national platforms of 1900 and 1904, this charge as to panic was reiterated with brutal emphasis by the Republican party. That party has committed itself irrevocably to the doctrine that so long as the country continues prosperous the dominant party should retain control of the Government, but that when a panic comes it should be summarily expelled from power. Republicans have prescribed this standard by which parties shall be judged. Sternly have they required its obedience by Democrats. Having thus prescribed, our Republican friends should cheerfully take the dose of their own medicine, however bitter, that inevitably awaits them at the polls in November next. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest a plank for insertion in the next national Democratic platform. It is a compilation of the stereotyped, copyrighted phrases contained in the various national Republican platforms extending back to the year 1896, and supposed to depict conditions under Democratic rule. They must have been drawn with prophetic eye, for they describe the present receding panic with remarkable precision and accuracy. Without contortion, save to substitute the party names, I here present from those platforms a comprehensive and graphic picture of the Republican panic of 1907–8:

The American people have witnessed the calamitous consequences of full and unrestricted Republican control of the Government. In the broad effect of its policy it has precipitated panic, blighted industry and trade with prolonged depression, closed factories, reduced work and wages, halted enterprise. Business is dead, industry paralyzed.

The country's capital is hidden away and its labor distressed and unemployed. The country is in evil plight, oppressed with misfortunes and doubtful of the future. The revenues are declining, the debt is growing, the standard of values is threatened and uncertain, hope is faint, and confidence is gone.

Every consideration of public safety and individual interest demands that the Government shall be rescued from the hands of those who have shown themselves incapable of conducting it without disaster.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

This sweeping indictment, which will be brought against the Republican party in the coming campaign, meets every requirement of Republican precedent, and before winter comes again, an impartial jury of American voters will report that it is amply sustained by the facts. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding Democrats' freedom from censure for the country's deplorable experience, every member of the minority is at all times ready to freely lend his unreserved cooperation in aid of suitable relief. No Democratic minority, when the nation faced a crisis, has ever obstructed the majority in any reasonable and legitimate effort to respond to the country's need. One of the first articles of the Democratic faith exacts unyielding devotion under all circumstances to the country's best interests. The practice of this faultless precept has made Democracy and patriotism synonymous terms.

Mr. Chairman, Republicans have claimed that the panic of 1892–93 was due to the prospect of an incoming Democratic Administration. This is untrue. But it is true that the present gradual disappearance of a worse Republican panic is due to the belief of the swift and certain advent of a Democratic Administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE CHIEF UNDERLYING CAUSE OF THE PANIC.

Mr. Chairman, the number of opinions advanced as to the cause of the present disaster has only been exceeded by the number of suggestions of relief.

It is said by many that the panic was not due to any one agency but is traceable to a number of contributing causes, among which is overtrading, overcapitalization, overexpansion of credit, defective financial laws, defective antitrust laws, overdose of prosperity, values too high, an unjust and unequal system of taxation, stock gambling and defective law as to bank reserves, insufficient railway-rate laws, unsound administrative policies, etc.

However, every person agrees that business has received a severe blow, and every one knows from whence that blow directly came—New York City.

A spokesman of the great moneyed interests recently made the startling admission that—

The financial condition of the country to-day is the worst any nation, civilized or uncivilized, has ever seen.

Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Gage, following him, said:

I agree that the system could not be worse. No more humiliating spectacle was ever seen than within the last six months, when 8,000 banks stopped business in a minute, as though at the ringing of a bell.

While the urgent necessity of remedying the immediate causes of the country's suffering should not for a moment be overlooked by Congress, yet it is of essential, vital importance that the chief cause of the immediate causes of our ills, the generating force that is constantly producing these intermediate causes, should be kept before the American people. In my judgment, the original underlying cause of the chief immediate causes of the panic is that species of vicious class legislation that has been on the statute books since the war, barring a brief interval, and which Republican Governor Cummings, of Iowa, has correctly characterized in this language:

All the robberies and thefts committed by all the insurance officers since life insurance was first originated do not amount to as much extortion as the Dingley bill for one year.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the trusts are intrenched behind the walls of the protective-tariff system. The flag of monopoly has always floated above the ramparts of protection.

During the first seventy years of the nation's history we had a system of taxation ridiculously low when compared with the subsequent Republican tariffs. The exigencies of war gave birth to a high protective tariff. Then it was that a long-standing, silent partnership was entered into between the beneficiaries of protection and the Government, the Republican party acting in the dual capacity of agent for both.

Prior to this time we heard no discussion about the masses and the classes, about the favored few and the oppressed millions, about the rapid and enormous concentration of wealth in the hands of a small number of persons, but all viewed the Government as did Jefferson when he said:

The equal rights of man and the happiness of every individual are now acknowledged to be the only legitimate objects of government. Modern times have the signal advantage, too, of having discovered the only device by which these rights can be secured, to wit, government by the people, acting not in person, but by representatives chosen by themselves.

Sad to say, the era of protection has put an end to the time-honored doctrine of equality before the law and nullified the Constitution. It has created in this country an exclusive privileged class and poured into its lap unearned wealth "beyond the dreams of avarice." It levies harsh and oppressive tribute upon the masses of the people from the cradle to the grave. It clothed a limited number with the hereditary caste of American nobility and translated them to the luxurious ease of baronial castles, gilded yachts, and sumptuous private cars, while it artfully and ruthlessly condemned the toiling millions to a life of servitude and vassalage. Yes; for more than forty years the sleepless monster of protection, clothed in the sacred livery of the law, has invaded every humble American home and exacted its "pound of flesh," until now ten of its pampered pets can, to use the apt language of Senator Depew, "paralyze the whole country, for they can control the circulation of the currency, and create a panic whenever they will."

I shall append to my remarks an extract from the Philadelphia North American, a paper that has never been Democratic, detailing the connection of certain institutions and persons with the present panic. Also an extract from the Washington Post, a pro-Republican paper, on "Standard Oil." Also an extract from that great Republican daily, the Chicago Journal, on "The West and the tariff bandits."

The impartial student of industrial and economic conditions must agree that the "colossal trusts," the "criminal rich," the "malefactors of wealth," and the possessors of "swollen fortunes" owe their existence chiefly to the operation of the Republican doctrine of protection.

So long as no fountain can be purified while a contaminated stream flows into it, so long can no kind of effort to curb and suppress trust violators succeed unless such effort strikes at the main source of their constant creation—the protective tariff. The country is in sad need of financial legislation, it is daily suffering the consequences of lax enforcement of the law, the railway rate law is in some respects grossly inefficient, but while Congress is responding to the wishes and needs of the people by dealing with these questions, the king of evils, our present tariff, should be given a place near the center of the stage.

Then what is the remedy? This Government can only be successfully conducted by means of political parties. To which of the two leading parties, then, can the American people look with most hope of relief? To the party whose policy constantly begets these giant octopuses, these Herculean Sampsons, or to the party whose glorious reign under the Constitution during most of the first seventy years of the nation's history will be pointed to by all the coming ages as a model government by a model people? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

REIGN OF CRIMINAL PLUTOCRACY, ALIAS THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The history of the Republican party is a history of hypocrisy, duplicity, and false pretense. While it has pretended to be a separate, self-subsisting entity, it is in fact as inseparably joined to the cohorts of privilege and monopoly as was Ephraim to his idols; one is the complement of the other. Forty-odd years ago the Republican party began a happy affinity with the privileged class. Since then each has considered itself the true affinity of the other.

In its last national platform the Republican party boasts that the Democratic party has had complete control of the Government for only two years of the previous forty-four years of the nation's history, and that the Republican party has held control of some one or more branches of the Government during the remaining forty-two years, which boast, when interpreted in the light of history, implies that for almost fifty years the criminal plutocracy, alias the Republican party, has had this unhappy country by the throat. During all this time its forces gave free rein to their unbridled appetites for gain and their wicked lust for power. The unexampled patience and forbearance of the American people under this trying ordeal of pillage and plunder reads like a story from the feudal ages in England. I emphasize the statement that Government rule during the last fifty years has been by the iron hand of the privileged, moneyed class, cloaked behind the velvet name of the Republican party; and this epoch will go down in history as the reign of the trust and the combine. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Not one instance can be found wherein a conflict of interest has arisen between the American people and the hosts of rapacity and greed in which the Republican party did not forsake the standard of the people and rush to the defense of privilege. [Applause on Democratic side.]

On the subject of taxation this party has always stood for the doctrine that taxation is a blessing to the poor, but a curse to the rich. Save in occasional instances, when laboring under the greatest pressure from outraged public sentiment, every act of this monopoly-ridden organization has been to swell and bloat the gains of the rich and pile up the burdens of the poor. This party has been long in conspiracy with the beneficiaries of class legislation to fasten the dreadful fangs of the "criminal rich" deeper in the struggling bodies of those who toil.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican doctrine of protection diverts business from natural and legitimate to artificial channels. It causes a rapid centralization of wealth in the hands of a few, who manipulate it in such a manner as to render business conditions constantly unnatural, uncertain, and unstable and to make panics possible at any time. Many fruitful causes of panic would be far removed by a return of the country to the old-fashioned Democratic doctrine of a revenue tariff. [Applause on Democratic side.] This would insure business stability, based upon sound and natural laws and consequent normal conditions.

REPUBLICAN PARTY A MERE TIMESERVER.

Since 1896 the Republican party has assumed so many inconsistent, antagonistic, and repugnant positions upon most public questions as to forfeit the people's confidence and respect. It has become famous as a trimmer, a temporizer, and a timeserver. In 1896 it declared in favor of gold monometalism, while in 1888, it had declared in favor of both gold and silver as standard money, and actually denounced the Democratic party for its efforts to demonetize silver.

In 1896 its platform condemned Cleveland's Administration in unmeasured terms, for "piling up the public debt in time of peace."

This charge was reiterated in its platform of 1904.

In 1907, with unblushing effrontery, in a time of profound peace, swallowing its own utterances condemnatory of this policy, the Republican Administration proceeded to heap upon the backs of the American people, already bending with overburdens, an increased public debt of many millions of dollars. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The Democratic party condemned this policy in its platform of 1896 and consistently condemns it now.

GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION.

In 1896 the Democratic platform criticised "government by injunction" as "a new and highly dangerous form of oppression by which Federal judges, in contempt of the laws of the States and rights of citizens, become at once legislators, judges, and executioners," and demanded legislation "providing for trials by jury in certain cases of contempt." This was reiterated in 1900.

In 1904 the national Democratic platform declared:

We approve the measure, which a Republican Congress has ever since refused to enact, relating to contempts in Federal courts and providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt.

For these utterances the Democratic party has been severely criticised by Republicans generally, as advocating a doctrine revolutionary and socialistic.

The last two Republican campaign text-books were especially caustic in their comments—the text-book of 1904 denouncing this declaration as "most reprehensible and obnoxious." This reflects the consensus of Republican opinion. Yet a Republican President not long since administered to a Chicago Federal judge a rebuke more severe than any Democrat ever uttered.

In his recent special message to Congress the President sharply directs attention to the very abuses Democrats have complained of for twelve years, and intimates that a revolt against the whole injunctive process may occur unless these abuses are remedied. Furthermore, he adds:

If he (a judge) clearly fails to do his duty by the public in dealing with law-breaking corporations, law-breaking men of wealth, he must expect to feel the weight of public opinion, and this is but right, for except in extreme cases, this is the only way in which he can be reached at all.

Gathering inspiration from his subject, the President, speaking further of the writ of injunction, says that—

It has sometimes been abused heedlessly and unjustly, and that some of the injunctions issued inflict grave and, occasionally, irreparable wrong upon those enjoined. It is all wrong to use the injunction to prevent the entirely proper and legitimate actions of labor organizations in their struggle for industrial betterment, or, under the guise of protecting property rights, unwarrantably to invade the fundamental rights of the individual. It is futile to concede, as we all do, the right and necessity of organized effort on the part of wage-earners, and yet, by injunctive process, to forbid peaceable action to accomplish the lawful objects for which they are organized and upon which their success depends.

To whom does the President refer in this grave and serious charge? Does he refer to Judges Wood and Grosscup, who, in 1894, enjoined certain officers of the American Railway Union from using persuasion to induce railway employees to quit work? Or does he refer to Judge Jackson, of the United States district court of West Virginia, who, in 1897, granted a broad injunction against everybody, forbidding anyone from persuading the miners of that State to quit the employment of the contractors? Or is it possible that he indicts Judge William H. Taft for issuing an injunction in 1894 to prohibit men employed by the Northern Pacific Railroad from striking? The same judge, too, who in that year assailed the Pullman boycott with the writ of injunction and stated at the time that "the gigantic character of the conspiracy of the American Railway Union staggers the imagination."

The President's unqualified imputation rests upon every Federal judge. Then, will the laboring man shout for Mr. Taft in the coming campaign? A man who as a Federal judge, in the language of the message, "abused the writ of injunction heedlessly and unjustly" and "used the injunction to prevent the entirely proper and legitimate actions of labor organizations in their struggle for industrial betterment;" and who thus rammed the rod of judicial oppression, as a red-hot iron, down the throat of American labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I congratulate the country, as well as the President, upon his conversion to the Democratic view. For, in 1896, Mr. Roosevelt, speaking of the "government by injunction" plank in the Democratic platform, said:

This represents a species of atavism—that is, of recurrence to the ways of thought of remote barbarian ancestors. Savages do not want an independent and upright judiciary. They want the judge to decide their way, and if he does not, they want to behead him.

Mr. Chairman, is it possible that the Darwinian theory is true, and has the President developed into a Republican or a Democratic "savage?" By indirection, the President is in the attitude of characterizing a part of the Ohio Republican platform adopted a few days since as "a species of atavism," and its authors as "barbarians" and "savages." For that platform favors "limitation in the exercise of the power of injunction, in order to prevent its abuse." The platform implies the existence of abuses. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ARBITRATION.

The Democratic party has demanded in its last three platforms legislation embodying the principle of arbitration of differences between employers engaged in interstate commerce and employees. Only since the last national campaign has this doctrine found favorable expression in a President's message. The Republican party denied the people this legislation for a generation. It would not have found lodgment in any other Republican President's message.

RAILWAY RATE LAW.

Republicans are given to frequent vociferous expressions of self-laudation because of the enactment of the railroad law of 1906. The facts are that specific demand for this legislation was contained in each national Democratic platform since 1896. The platforms of the Republican party for this period were silent upon this great question and, although President Roosevelt as far back as 1901 in his annual message pointed out that the interstate-commerce law of 1887 was defective and inefficient, and urged Congress to amend it, and repeated this recommendation with added emphasis in each subsequent message, yet a Republican Congress stubbornly denied the country this relief until finally some of the majority in Congress, in fear of "the big stick" and smarting under the lash of aroused public sentiment, were enabled by the aid of a solid Democratic minority to give the people some of that substantial relief which the Republican party had obstinately withheld from them for ten years.

Both political parties are entitled to credit for this wholesome enactment—the united Democrats who supported it from sincere conviction, and the divided Republicans who reluctantly supported it in order to avoid the avenging wrath of the American people. [Applause.]

INCOME TAX.

In 1896, the Democratic party declared in favor of an income tax. Nine-tenths of that party favors such tax to-day.

In 1894, this later-day Republican party cast off the teachings of its great founders and arrayed itself solidly against this policy so eminently just and fair to all. Their campaign book of that year denounced it in the following language:

In this country an income tax of any sort is odious and will bring odium upon any party blind enough to impose it.

Again, I find this solemn warning:

Prepare for the funeral of the political party which imposes such a burden.

Just under this doleful exclamation, I insert the utterance of a conscience-stricken Republican President, contained in the last annual message to Congress:

A graduated income tax of the proper type would be a desirable feature of Federal taxation, and it is to be hoped that one may be devised which the Supreme Court will declare constitutional.

Listen also to this statement of Secretary Taft, in a speech at Columbus, Ohio, August 20, 1907. After stating that the Supreme Court had declared the income tax unconstitutional, he said:

In times of great national need, an income tax would be of great assistance in furnishing means to carry on the Government, and it is not free from doubt how the Supreme Court, with changed membership, would view a new income-tax law under such conditions.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] twitted this side of the House with some supposed utterance of Mr. Bryan which, if true, is, from one view point, unorthodox. I imagine if he [Mr. DALZELL] should publicly express his private opinion of his President's position upon this, as well as some other questions, considerable toning down would be necessary to make it fit to print.

PATERNALISM.

Mr. Chairman, the most insidious foe to American government under the Constitution is this "new federalism."

The President is its chief exponent. It is one of "my policies." Since his effort to indoctrinate the country along this line the inquiry, "Are you for or against the Constitution?" has become quite common among the people. The President is paternally and eternally advocating doctrines so extremely federalistic and paternalistic as to cause the present generation to view his strange course with awe and amazement, and such as would have put to shame Alexander Hamilton himself. The following language of the President, contained in a speech delivered at Philadelphia, bears a striking resemblance to some of the recent fatherly suggestions of the Czar of Russia to his Douma:

We need, through Executive action, through legislative, and through judicial interpretation and construction of law, to increase the power of the Federal Government. If we fail thus to increase it, we show our impotence.

In awful contrast with this remarkable deliverance I wish to remind you of the love and reverence in which the Constitution and Government under its principles were held by the American Congress and the American people before the war.

I read from the memorable address of the Vice-President, delivered in vacating the old Senate Chamber to occupy the new one:

Is there an American who regrets the past? Is there one who will deride his country's laws or pervert her Constitution? * * * If there be such a man, let his memory descend to posterity laden with the execration of all mankind.

Concluding, he said:

And now Senators, we leave this memorable Chamber, bearing with us unimpaired the Constitution we received from our forefathers. Let us cherish it with grateful acknowledgments of the Divine Power who controls the destinies of empires and whose goodness we adore. The structures reared by men yield to the corroding tooth of time. These marble walls must molder into ruins; but the principles of constitutional liberty, guarded by wisdom and virtue, unlike material elements, do not decay. Let us devoutly trust that another Senate, in another age, shall bear to a new and larger Chamber this Constitution, vigorous and inviolate, and that the last generation of posterity shall witness the deliberations of the representatives of American States still united, prosperous, and free.

Mr. Chairman, this was the spirit of the American people during the reign of liberty and law.

But, alas, the decadence of our national ideals have left many of the American people imbued with a spirit of admiration for a kingly government.

Emotional as the French, infatuated with regal splendor, lost to a sense of true Americanism, they delight to cringe before sordid wealth and to fawn at the feet of power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So long as a shred of the Constitution remains, Democrats will be found insisting, as one man, on the reserved rights of the States and demanding strict observance of the constitutional limitations upon Federal power.

PRETENDED TRUST SUPPRESSION.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] taunted Democrats with the alleged failure of Cleveland's Administration to properly enforce the antitrust law of 1890; but being unable to extract any comfort from its comparison with McKinley's Administration, he carefully omits the latter and cites the Roosevelt Administration. It is well he did, for President McKinley in his last annual message could only name two prosecutions of any importance that had been instituted under this law during his entire Administration. Harrison's Administration was even worse. The Democratic record on the question of trust evils and trust suppression antedates that of our Republican friends, commencing as it does in January, 1888, when a Democratic House of Representatives adopted a resolution that resulted in an exhaustive investigation and an elaborate report embodying all available facts as to trust operations and violations. From that date there has been no division among Democrats upon this absorbing question. Mr. Chairman, the public mind has derived a confused and exaggerated idea as to the real nature and extent of trust suppression by the present Administration.

Far more time and effort has been consumed in exploiting proposed and threatened prosecutions than has been devoted to actual prosecutions. Under the fostering and protecting wing of the Dingley law a dozen trust violators spring into existence even while the President is effervescing and threatening to prosecute one. Yes, the President loudly inveighs against the trust evils—the evils of the protective tariff which he champions. The American people are merely experiencing an optical illusion due to the pyrotechnic display of the President.

He assumed an attitude in his last annual message which he directly antagonizes in his recent special message. In the latter we find the following language:

> The apologists of successful dishonesty always declaim against any effort to punish or prevent it, on the ground that any such effort will "unsettle business."

In his annual message he himself adopts this same argument in support of the parent of "successful dishonesty," as follows:

> This country is definitely committed to the protective system, and any effort to uproot it could not but cause widespread industrial disaster.

In his annual message, 1901, he says:

> Nothing could be more unwise than to disturb the business interests of the country by any general tariff change at this time.

The President breathes out dire threats of punishment against the principals in the crime, but almost in the same breath he loudly demands that the accessory before the fact shall go free. By his own act, he neutralizes his efforts and renders his Administration powerless to suppress these open violators of the law.

After many years of glorious opportunity, few have been prosecuted, none are behind prison bars. Mr. Chairman, I emphasize the view that the doors of the jails and penitentiaries should open as wide to receive the criminal rich as the criminal poor. But why are the American people so credulous as to expect this character of relief from the Republican party?

How do they expect either of the component elements of that sweet, delectable trinity, the tariff, the trusts, and the Republican party, to rise up and slay the others? As quickly would the mother destroy her young. True, this elegant triumvirate, this e pluribus unum, comprises three nominally separate corporations, but all are operated under one and the same management.

It is a travesty upon common sense to expect the Republican party, which is the pliant tool, the shield-bearer, the toady, the lackey, the flunky of the trusts, to fight with them any other than a sham battle.

While in order to palter with public sentiment, they may at times assume a public attitude of feigned hostility, but when in seclusion they doubtless engage in the blissful pastime of bestowing upon each other that invention of modern society, the "soul kiss."

Try as he may the President can no more wrench them apart than he could clear the top of the Washington Monument on a Western broncho.

The Republican party is honor bound, in so far as honor can exist among certain classes, to love, cherish, obey, and protect the tariff and the trusts, "both in sickness and in health, until death doth them part."

THE PRESIDENT.

In a broad spirit of patriotism, Democrats have generously applauded every Democratic act and utterance of the President, but they have as vigorously condemned his many more Republican acts and Republican utterances.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those Democrats who think Mr. Bryan should place Mr. Roosevelt in nomination for President. While he has embraced, or seemed to embrace, certain Democratic doctrines, yet he has not thus far committed the Republican party to them. Instead he usually refers to them as "my policies." Again, who knows that this controversy between the President and "swollen wealth" is not a mere love quarrel, possible of early reconciliation and once more presenting the scene of—

> Two souls with but a single thought,
> Two hearts that beat as one.

They were in close embrace in 1904.

The President but seldom talks or acts like a Democrat. He does not wear a Democratic uniform. He must first renounce all Republican heresy, be baptized in the Democratic faith, and receive the baptismal name before I shall proclaim myself his follower.

True, a few blasts by him upon the Democratic bugle horn evokes applause from Democrats; but not to the bugler—only to the pleasing strains of Democratic music—is such enthusiasm due.

While the President has done many admirable things, for which he is accorded a due meed of praise, at the same time he has contributed more than all other influences of the past and present generation to the creation of a line of vicious and evil precedents that would be a lasting curse to the worst despotism in the world.

His contempt and utter disregard for the plain mandates of the Constitution have become proverbial.

The only problem with him is, not how to follow the Constitution as it was written, expounded, and construed by the fathers, but how to make the Constitution follow him on his journey to the north pole of paternalism. The poor old Constitution has been unable to follow the flag under Republican rule; still less is it able to follow the trackless trail of a rashly adventurous and constantly exploring President. He has ignored the other coordinate departments of the Government and treated them as mere subordinate appendages. He has disturbed and destroyed the equipoise in which the three coordinate departments have been held from the beginning—a balance so vital to the harmony and successful operation of our scheme of government under the Constitution. Democracy registers a loud protest against such flagrant Executive usurpation. No man entertaining these views can secure even standing room in the Democratic household.

Mr. Chairman, drunk with power, the Republican party has become inert and inefficient, corrupt and servile.

It has achieved its manifest destiny. It has neither reformed nor economized. It failed to look at the signboards and ran the car of prosperity onto a commercial turntable.

The real meaning of Republican mottoes and campaign slogans has finally dawned upon the American people. Their rallying cry of "protection and prosperity" is but another name for "power and plunder." Their motto, "Protection is panic proof," has all the time meant "Protection is proof of panic," and that campaign yell, "A full dinner pail," but presaged "empty stomachs."

ISSUES.

There is no loss for vital issues, sharp and well defined, in the coming campaign.

Suppression of lawless combinations and proper curbing of corporate wealth is an issue. So is the outrageous tariff, Executive usurpation, home rule and the guaranteed rights of the States, government by injunction, income tax, efficient railway rate regulation, steamship and other subsidies, extravagant appropriations, legislation securing to labor its just rights, a sound financial system, maladministration of government. These are only some of the issues. On each of these questions Democracy will be found where it has always stood—by the rights of the people. It opposes the Government incorporation and control of all corporations doing an interstate business, for if the General Government once invades the rights of the States for one purpose it may then invade them at all times for all purposes. This party for the same reason favors the enactment of laws by the States, and not by the General Government, to prohibit employment of child labor. It is opposed to the Government ownership of railroads.

The Democratic party is conservative whenever conservatism will suffice; it is radical whenever radicalism is necessary to uproot deep-seated evils that afflict the country. It makes no war on wealth. While it declares eternal war on wealthy violators of the law, it guarantees to all law-abiding aggregations of wealth freedom from molestation. No party can be conservative on all policies all the time.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican party has not led a sinless life. It has debauched the public conscience and established a government of arbitrary power for one of clearly defined limited power, under which the rights and liberties of the people might find protection. It has no fixed doctrines save the protective tariff, blind subserviency to corporate wealth, and paternalism, and only a spirit of brigandage and commercialism binds it to these. Policies it espouses in one campaign it repudiates and denounces in the next. With it, what was orthodox to-day is blasphemy to-morrow. This party is constantly busy turning somersaults in a vain effort to serve its master, the "criminal rich," and at the same time avoid popular condemnation. Whether it nominates a radical or a conservative for the Presidency this year, it will adopt a platform of platitudes loud in their pretended condemnation of "predatory wealth" and in their mock professions of loyalty to the people's interests.

In stentorian tones will they indorse "my policies." To do otherwise would be to invoke annihilation. But if the conservative element supports the ticket nominated, the American people can be assured that after the election this party will throw off its thin disguise and again disclose its old set of policies, designed to shield the criminal plutocracy.

A Roosevelt, or radical, Republican would then become no more than a little, malignant pustule on the Republican elephant.

If, upon the other hand, it were possible for that party to be sincere in its professions and promises, the conservative element would not support the ticket nominated upon a radical platform, and defeat would inevitably result.

In craven fear of the coming day of the people's judgment, already comatose and moribund, this party is making one last desperate effort to prolong its miserable existence, either by buying the people with promises or bullying them with threats.

It says, "Although we have controlled the Government for many years, and although there is a crying, insistent demand for tariff revision, we decline to give relief during this or the next session of Congress; wait until after the election; the people can not be trusted; let them deliver first." In the meantime it will say to the protected favorites, "Give us a few millions for campaign purposes and after the 4th of next March we will revise the tariff upward," while it will say to the tax-ridden people asking it to correct its own evils, "Continue us in power, and after the 4th of March next we will revise the tariff downward." Unparalleled duplicity and arrogance!

The American people will spurn the insolent demand of this corrupt and decayed party for an uninterrupted lease on Federal power. They can only turn to the Democratic party for relief along all needed lines—a party that serves no one class but the whole people alike. This they will do. And when he, who has fought many battles for the people and not one against them, leaves his humble home on the plains of the West and comes here on the 4th of next March to preside over the destinies of this great Republic, he will receive more than a Roman welcome. Then will this Government return to the old-fashioned honesty and simplicity of its earlier days when, under the benign influence of Democratic rule, it blossomed into a great nation.

Mr. Chairman, we read with admiration of the golden age of English literature. Far down the centuries, future ages will look back to that happy and glorious period of American Government before the war, and pronounce the solemn verdict that it constitutes the golden age of human freedom and human government in the world's history. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The following is from the Philadelphia North American of November 25, 1907:

THIRTY-SIX PER CENT PATRIOTISM.

If Secretary of the Treasury Cortelyou understood fully what he was doing last week, he proved himself unfaithful to his trust. If he did not understand the full meaning of his acts—and it is difficult for us to believe that he did—he proved himself incompetent to fill his present office.

The first thing necessary is that the people of the country should be made to understand exactly what has been done. Our purpose now is that explanation, in simple, definite terms. We shall not deal with suppositions, possibilities, or deductions, but with plain facts and simple mathematics.

The proposition made public by Secretary Cortelyou Friday night is for the banks of the country to make a payment into the National Treasury of $25,000,000 in cash, and a deposit of securities amounting to $75,000,000. These securities are to be given only as a pledge. The title to them will remain vested in the banks. The income from them will go to the banks.

It is apparent that the idea of a payment is eliminated from the $75,000,000 deposit. The nominal transfer is reduced to a mere matter of bookkeeping.

For the $25,000,000 payment Secretary Cortelyou agrees to turn over to the banks $100,000,000 of debt certificates, upon which the Government is pledged to pay to the banks 3 per cent interest, or $3,000,000.

Secretary Cortelyou next will receive these debt certificates back from the banks and hold them as security for the issue of $100,000,000 of national-bank note currency, which the bankers will loan to customers at present rates of from 6 to 10 per cent. Figured at the legal rate, the banks thus will receive a profit of 6 per cent on this currency, or $6,000,000.

Therefore the banks, upon a payment of $25,000,000, will receive under the Cortelyou plan 3 per cent interest on the debt certificates and at least 6 per cent on the currency, a total of $9,000,000. This profit of $9,000,000 on an investment of $25,000,000 yields a profit of 36 per cent.

This computation, however, is based upon the assumption that the $25,000,000 to be paid by the banks is the banks' own money. As a matter of fact, the money is the Government's, as the banks now hold nearly $250,000,000 of Government deposits, upon which they pay not one cent of interest.

Of course, Secretary Cortelyou would not father this outrage unless he thought it would accomplish some object. All agree that the business of the country is crippled, largely because of the lack of actual money in circulation. The sole avowed purpose of the Cortelyou plan is to force into circulation $100,000,000 of new bank notes.

But if Mr. Cortelyou were possessed of any knowledge of the subject, and were in addition a courageous and single-minded official, he could have accomplished the same thing in a shorter time without paying one cent of tribute to the banks or doing any one of them the slightest injustice.

It is plain that the mere act of taking $25,000,000 out of the national banks and placing it in the National Treasury does not increase the volume of money one dollar. If it did, Mr. Cortelyou need not have bribed the banks into the transfer, for these same banks already hold nearly $250,000,000 of the people's money, and the Secretary of the Treasury could have ordered $25,000,000 at any time from these banks.

The only relief Mr. Cortelyou hopes for is to come from the $100,000,000 new currency which the national banks will be induced to take out.

Now, it is a matter of common knowledge that throughout this crisis—a money stringency which had been foreseen for many months—the national banks have proved their utter lack of patriotism by refusing to issue more than $200,000,000 of currency, which they were entitled to take out by the size of their capitalization.

While manufacturers, merchants, and all business men were taxed, annoyed, and hurt, all these classes submitted uncomplainingly to embarrassment and loss for the sake of the general welfare. But the national banks, in cold blood, preyed upon the public misfortune by refusing to take out circulation, because they could make larger profits on the money of the people deposited with them in other ways than by buying the bonds needed for bank-note issues.

The sole feature of the Cortelyou plan for which commendation conceivably can be asked is that these banks will be induced to take out one-half as much extra currency as they are entitled to issue. Yet, as The North American pointed out days ago, the Secretary of the Treasury could have forced such issue at any time by serving notice upon the banks that they must take out the needed currency or he would withdraw the Government's deposits from those which persisted in refusal and deposit the amounts in the South and West, to move the crops.

Such a demand would have been both just and reasonable. It would have been met with violent protest, but with prompt submission. It would not have been necessary to withdraw a single Treasury deposit. The currency would have been taken out in every instance. It would not have hurt the banks. It would quickly have brought whatever relief this plan will bring. It would have been even less open to criticism on the score of being a measure of inflation than this plan. It would have increased or diminished credit exactly as this plan will do.

The chief difference in the two plans is that one would not have taxed the people for a huge sum of money with which to bribe the banks to do what is nothing more nor less than their clear and simple duty in the circumstances.

The North American realized some time ago that conditions had reached the danger point; that wicked and powerful influences were at work and tending to destroy the prosperity of the country.

In common with every person possessed of good sense and patriotism, we were willing to submit even to the doubtful experiment of applying a war measure in time of peace. We could not approve, but we refrained from censure.

For the general good, the press of the whole country with one accord adopted an optimistic tone and withheld criticism where ordinarily criticism would have been compelled. But to all things there is a limit.

The North American saw Wall street force the banks of New York, and through them the whole country, to suspend cash payments. We saw the New York Clearing House issue $100,000,000 of certificates which are illegal. We saw the banks everywhere refusing arbitrarily to pay back to depositors their own money. We saw the issuance of $50,000,000 of bonds, ostensibly to build the Panama Canal, when such was not the need or purpose of their sale. We saw the imposition of this tax upon the people, coupled with a $100,000,000 issue of debt certificates, at a time when the nation is not in debt, but, on the contrary, has in banks $250,000,000. We saw these debt certificates declared the basis for a currency issue, and knew that ruling to be a strain upon the most elastic construction of the law.

Yet, seeing all these things, we kept silent. Our belief was that the ends sought might justify even these means; that the peace and happiness of the nation hung in the balance, and that the extraordinary measures used might defeat the schemes of public enemies working to wreck the national welfare.

Acts that in ordinary circumstances would have seemed well-nigh criminal to us we condoned. And we stand as ready to defend our course as we are to make this admission.

But now that Mr. Cortelyou offers to pay the banks 36 per cent to induce them to put forth currency which every instinct of justice, right, and good citizenship held them morally bound to issue without a bribe; when the Secretary of the Treasury does this thing at a time when his signature and ten brave words would have brought about the same result, without taxing the people one cent and without injustice to a single banker, our patience ceases.

When it comes to approving such an act, count The North American out. An offense that smells to heaven, as does this catering to Wall street, is too rank for our tolerance. * * *

The following is from the Washington Post of February 23, 1908:

MONOPOLY AND THE TARIFF.

The Standard Oil Company earns a quarterly dividend of 15 per cent on its capital, or 60 per cent per annum. One would think this concern can stand alone without the tariff crutch the Dingley law supplies it of 15 cents per gallon duty hid away in the "free" petroleum of the tariff schedules. So protective is this tariff that not one barrel of petroleum is imported from Russia to compete with Standard oil, though that monopoly sells to foreigners goods at 8 cents a gallon for which it charges our own people 11 cents.

The G. O. P. is now engaged in its grand quadrennial round-up of votes. It has a majority in both Houses of Congress, and the President is a Republican. If the Republican leaders should jam through both Houses House bill 16862, "to place petroleum, crude or refined, and the products of petroleum, crude or refined, on the free list," it would make more votes for the Republican ticket next November than all the other legislation the Sixtieth Congress is likely to enact at its first session. It can be done between the rising and setting of a single sun any day of the session. It can be done by unanimous consent any moment of any sitting of either House.

It was hoped, and so advised by the President, that wood pulp and print paper would be put on the free list. It will not be denied that the present duties on those articles, practically prohibitory, are oppressive, odious, and monopolistic; but Congress would as soon legislate against the tides of ocean this session as against the paper trust and the wood-pulp trust. Perhaps the Republican leaders are persuaded that they have votes enough already secured to carry the election in November.

It is now demonstrated to this generation, as the same thing was made plain to the country in 1873, that a highly protective tariff is no effective guard against a financial panic and an industrial prostration. * * *

The following is from the Chicago Journal (Republican):

THE WEST AND THE TARIFF BANDITS.

When the Dingley tariff was being framed Eastern trust magnates and money kings seized upon Congress and fixed the tariff schedules to suit themselves, so the masses of the people would have to pay them tribute. * * * The principle of protection must be maintained, but the tariff must be so altered that it will no longer bleed the West and South for the benefit of a few Wall street business bandits.

[Mr. WOLF addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no subject before this House that deserves greater consideration than legislation looking to the destruction of the many unlawful and vicious trusts now preying upon the people. Yet this House has been in session for more than three months, and, so far as I have been able to observe, no attempt has been made to interfere with the privileges they now enjoy. I therefore rise this afternoon to discuss the trust question, with the hope that I may be able to awaken and arouse such an interest as will result in the enactment into law of a bill I have introduced in the House to suppress trusts, pools, and combinations in restraint of trade.

I am here representing a large agricultural and manufacturing district, and the people I have the honor to represent have felt the cruel hand of the trust in the closing of factories and fixing of prices of both products and labor. It is universally recognized, Mr. Chairman, that gigantic trusts and combinations designed to enable capital to secure more than its just share of the joint products of capital and labor, and which have sprung up at an alarming rate under existing law, are a menace to beneficial competition and an obstacle to permanent business prosperity. It is also admitted that private monopolies are indefensible and intolerable. They destroy competition, control the price of all material and of the finished product, thus robbing both producer and consumer. They lessen the employment of labor and arbitrarily fix the terms and conditions thereof, and deprive individual energy and a small capital of their opportunity for betterment. They are the most efficient means yet devised for appropriating the fruits of industry to the benefit of a few at the expense of the many, and unless their insatiate greed is checked, all wealth will be aggregated in a few hands and the Republic destroyed. Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law. When permitted to exist and allowed to carry out the purpose of their organization, in whole or in part, they stifle legitimate enterprise, take advantage of labor, and prove a burden to the toiling millions. I concede, Mr. Chairman, the right of an individual, or an association of persons, or of a corporation to sell his or its labor, the product of his or their intellectual energy, or his or its property for the highest and best price that may be obtained in an open, free market, using fair and unquestionable methods. No one will question the right of persons, corporations, or associations to use their skill, intelligence, progressiveness, and energy in an honest way to advance their business enterprise and secure pecuniary profit.

No matter whether the profit is large or whether it is small, if it is honestly and fairly obtained it is not a matter of legislative concern. But when the methods employed to secure pecuniary profit are such as to deprive others from entering or engaging in a like business, they are unfair and hurtful to the public and deserve the condemnation of the people. There are those who contend that we already have an antitrust law and that no further legislation is needed. The Sherman Act of 1890 is the law referred to, and during the existence of this law more trusts have been formed than were ever known before in the history of our country, and not a single one has been crushed. It is true there have been some prosecutions and a few fines assessed, but what does the trust care for a fine? In the end the people have to pay it in the way of increased prices on the product controlled. I assert, Mr. Chairman, that the Sherman antitrust law, as it now stands, is acceptable to the trusts. It is just what they want. They know that under its provisions not a single trust can be destroyed, not a single violator of the law can be put in the penitentiary, and that the worst that could come to them under the provisions of that law would be the assessment of a fine, which, if ever paid at all by them, would be collected from the people through increased prices on trust-made goods. And whenever a more stringent law is proposed some representative of the trusts is always ready to insist that we have an antitrust law and that no further legislation is needed on the subject. That practically all the necessities of life are controlled by trusts no one will deny. That the prices fixed by them and which the people are compelled to pay are exorbitant and burdensome is admitted. Then why not pass a law that will dissolve every trust doing business in this country? It can be done. There is no question about it. Let us make this once more a Government of the people and by the people instead of a Government of the trusts and by the trusts, through the enactment of a law that would not only impose a heavy fine, but also imprisonment for anyone found guilty of entering into any agreement in restraint of trade. [Applause.]

The Sherman Act has been the law for eighteen years, and you can not point to a single instance where that law has been sufficient to destroy a single trust; but, on the contrary, they have multiplied until we now have more than 400 trusts with a combined capital of over $10,000,000,000, and these powerful corporations are not only robbing and plundering the people, but they are attempting to dictate, and have largely dictated, legislation affecting their interests. It is a noticeable fact that Members who are active against this special privileged class are seldom returned to Congress on account of the power they wield and the contributions they are able to make to procure their defeat. I have already been advised by friends that my position on public questions, and my effort in behalf of the common people since Congress convened on the 2d day of last December is displeasing to the corporations, and that if I care to be reelected I had better not advocate anything detrimental to their interests. This suggestion, however, does not deter me in the least, as I would rather serve one term as a Member of this House and have the satisfaction of knowing I had discharged my whole duty to the people than to remain in Congress the balance of my life as the willing tool of greedy corporations. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, it is conceded that illegal combinations, trusts, and monopolies were never so numerous and powerful as at the present time. They control not only the manufacture and production of articles of necessity, general use, and consumption, the employment of labor, and the wages paid to it, but also control and fix the price these laborers must pay for the articles they necessarily use and consume in support of themselves and their families. Labor is hampered and impoverished. Such combinations naturally result in the formation of opposing organizations, and a resort to means or methods that often result in violations of the public peace. Oppression may be long endured, but sooner or later turbulence, violence, and possibly crime will result. There should be mutual confidence between capital and labor. They should work hand in hand for their mutual benefit and the growth and development of the nation. They should be willing to equitably divide the profits and share the losses of every business enterprise in which mutually engaged. Employer and employee should both be interested in the success of the business in which engaged, and neither have the moral or legal right to peril or destroy the property or property rights involved.

I am not an enemy of wealth. I want every man, rich and poor, high and low, old and young, to have the same privileges and opportunities and the same protection under the law. [Applause.]

Aggregated capital in the hands of honest men with honest notions and purposes is a blessing to labor and a help to mankind. In fact, modern civilization demands the employment of a vast amount of capital in carrying out our stupendous industrial enterprises. It is not the existence, but the abuse of corporate powers and combined capital that meets condemnation and denunciation and calls for remedial legislation. When combined capital in any hands abuses its legitimate powers, becomes oppressive, or assumes the form of gigantic monopolies, it becomes detrimental and dangerous to the nation. It then affects injuriously every citizen, unless it be the very few who fatten at the expense of the many. It then becomes greedy, extortionate, monarchial in its tendencies and practices, and invades the political field and legislative halls and seeks to corrupt both.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the future of this country depends upon the enactment of legislation that will give equal rights to all men and special privileges to none. [Applause.] Under our present system of tariff taxation and in the absence of effective antitrust legislation, stupendous trusts and combinations have sprung up, which have transferred a majority of the wealth of the country into the hands of a few trust magnates. It is an alarming fact that 4,000 men now own over 85 per cent of all the wealth of this country, and each one of the balance of the 89,000,000 people own an average of less than $500 in property. Government statistics, sir, show that fifty-one men, who have been the beneficiaries of the special privileges granted in the Dingley bill, now own $3,295,000,000 of this country's wealth. One thirty-fifth of the entire wealth of the United States is therefore concentrated in the hands of fifty-one men, and these men are to-day attempting to dictate legislation and discredit the present Administration, because the President has said some things that did not meet with their approval. Ah, Mr. Chairman, is not this a dangerous condition, and does it not demand immediate action? If this Government is to be preserved for the people, something must be done, and done quickly. Some time ago the President said something about the suppression of trusts, and immediately there went up a cry that he was disturbing business. The corporations were ready to take advantage of the fact that we are just now in the midst of a fearful panic; business is largely suspended everywhere; factories are closed; millions of men out of employment; a feeling of uncertainty and despair is sweeping the country, all of which is due to a lack of confidence in our business fabric, brought about by disclosures of dishonesty, corruption, and unlawfulness by our trust corporations. Is it not time, Mr. Chairman, we were repealing the Dingley tariff law, under which and by reason of which all trusts have been organized, and placing on our Federal statutes an antitrust law that is not a makeshift, but a law that means something; a law that will give the Government the right to put its violators in the penitentiary? [Applause.]

You will never suppress trusts under a law that gives only the right to assess a fine against the corporations, but when you add imprisonment you will make it effective.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a copy of some statistics prepared by Prof. J. H. Shinn of this city, showing the organization and growth of a few of the many trusts and their method of doing business. I shall not take the time to read these statistics, but will ask to have them printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks on this subject.

The paper referred to is as follows:

THE PRINCIPAL TRUSTS.

1. The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, otherwise known as "The Standard Oil Company," or the Standard.

From the report of the Commissioner of Corporations of the petroleum industry, issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor on May 20, 1907, the following facts concerning this corporation are put in evidence over the signature of Herbert Knox Smith, the Commissioner of Corporations, and directed to the President of the United States.

This corporation started in 1867 as a partnership under the firm name of Rockefeller, Andrews & Flagler; in 1870 they took the corporate form of the Standard Oil Company of Ohio, with a capital of $1,000,000. At that time they controlled not more than 10 per cent of the refining business of the country. Within ten years from that date the process of combination under these interests had been so rapid that they admittedly controlled from 90 per cent to 95 per cent of this branch of the oil industry, and their control of the pipe-line business had increased with equal rapidity. In 1882 they concentrated their holdings under the Standard Oil trust, which included the entire stock of fourteen companies and a majority interest in twenty-six additional concerns. The capitalization of the trust was $70,000,000 and the appraised valuation of its property over $55,000,000. Nine individuals, acting as trustees of the trust, owned together on that date more than $46,000,000 out of the $70,000,000 of the trust certificates issued. These nine men, with their holdings, were as follows:

Henry M. Flagler	60,000
Charles Pratt	54,000
O. H. Payne	50,000
William Rockefeller	32,000
J. A. Bostwick	34,000
W. G. Warden	29,400
John D. Archbold	7,000
Benjamin Brewster	8,180
Total	466,280

In 1892 the trust was attacked legally and the trustees announced that the trust would be dissolved and a process of so-called "dissolution" took place. Mr. Smith is very careful to tell us, however, that this dissolution in no way affected the original control of the aforesaid individuals over the entire concern, because the stocks of each of the various subsidiary corporations were not returned to their original holders, but were allotted to the holders of trust certificates on a pro rata basis, with the result that the trustees who had previously held the majority of the trust certificates now held the majority interest in each one of the constituent companies.

In 1898 contempt proceedings were started against the Standard Oil Company of Ohio on the ground that it had not withdrawn from the trust. Thereupon, pending the decision, these interests selected the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey as a holding corporation for the constituent Standard companies and increased its common stock to $100,000,000 for that purpose. This company then gave its own stock in exchange for the stocks of such companies. This change, like the previous one of 1892, as was its obvious purpose, left the monopoly power of the Standard capitalists undisturbed. The same group of men who had been holders of a majority of the trust certificates, then of a majority of the stocks in the subsidiary companies, now became holders of a majority of the stock of the controlling New Jersey company.

The outstanding stock of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey is about $98,000,000. It controls at least ten refining companies, four lubricating oil companies, three crude-oil producing companies, thirteen pipe-line and other transportation companies, six marketing companies, sixteen natural gas companies, and fifteen foreign concerns, besides having close affiliation with a considerable number of other concerns.

In 1904 it and its affiliated concerns refined over 84 per cent of the crude oil run through refineries; produced more than 86 per cent of the country's total output of illuminating oil; maintained a similar proportion of the export trade in illuminating oil; transported through pipe lines nearly nine-tenths of the crude oil of the older fields and 98 per cent of the crude of the mid-continent, or Kansas territory, fields; secured over 88 per cent of the sales of illuminating oil to retail dealers throughout the country, and obtained in certain large sections as high as 99 per cent of such sales. It also controlled practically similar proportions of the production and marketing of gasoline and lubricating oil.

Mr. Smith says:

"In brief, the history and present operation of these Standard interests show throughout the past thirty-five years a substantial monopolization of the petroleum industry of the country, a deliberate destruction of competition, and a consequent control of that industry by less than a dozen men, who have reaped enormous profits therefrom."

THE IRON AND STEEL TRUST.

The United States Steel Company was organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey in February and March, 1901, the trust buying outright all the companies forming the new combination. Moody's Manual for 1907 gives the capital stock of this trust, preferred and common, at $950,000,000, of which the constituent companies hold as follows:

1. Federal Steel, common and preferred	$99,000,000
2. National Tube, common and preferred	80,000,000
3. American Steel and Wire, common and preferred	90,000,000
4. National Steel, common and preferred	59,000,000
5. American Tin Plate, common and preferred	46,000,000
6. American Steel and Hoop, common and preferred	33,000,000
7. American Sheet Steel, common and preferred	49,000,000
8. American Bridge, common and preferred	61,000,000
9. Lake Superior, common and preferred	29,000,000
10. Shelby Steel Tube, common and preferred	13,000,000
11. Carnegie Company, common and preferred	160,000,000

In 1906 this trust declared a 7 per cent dividend on its preferred stock, amounting to $25,219,000, and a 2 per cent dividend on its common stock, amounting to $10,166,000. Moody's Manual gave the net profits available for dividends at the close of each quarter in the year 1906 as follows:

March 31	$22,371,000
June 30	24,536,000
September 30	23,543,000
December 31	27,767,000

In that year they declared four dividends of $8,846,432 each, and held a surplus undivided amounting to $97,720,714.

In the testimony taken before the Industrial Commission enough was proved to warrant the Commission in a unanimous finding that the capitalization of these combinations is usually a sum considerably above the value of the plants together with the patents they control. The Commission further says that in cases that are considered fairly conservative, the amount of stock issued, including both preferred and common stock, is from two to three times more than this value, while in not a few instances the capital stock seems to bear little relation to actual value of plants and patents.

THE SUGAR TRUST.

The Sugar Refineries Company, or the sugar trust, was organized August 6 and ready for work in November, 1887. It controlled practically all the sugar refining interests except two. Its authorized capital was $50,000,000. This trust was formed on the trustee basis, and upon suit being brought against it was reorganized as a single corporation in 1891, under the laws of New Jersey, with the same capital stock, under the name of the American Sugar Refining Company. In 1893 it bought out four Philadelphia concerns, which together produced about one-third of the total product of the United States, and a controlling interest in the Baltimore Sugar Refinery Company, and increased its capital $25,000,000. In 1896 Arbuckle Brothers, dealers in coffee, resolved to put up a sugar refinery in competition with the sugar trust. To throttle this the sugar trust bought a controlling interest in the Woolson Spice Company, of Toledo, Ohio, and entered upon the coffee business. The sugar trust was not able, however, to throttle the Arbuckle interest. Besides the Arbuckles, the competitors of the sugar trust are Claus Doscher, the Mollenhauer Sugar Refining Company, and the National Sugar Refining Company. The dividends run from 7 per cent to 12 per cent per annum. Mr. Havemeyer in his testimony said:

"I repeat that all this agitation against trusts is against merely the business machinery employed to take from the public what the Government in its tariff laws says it is proper and suitable they should have. It is the Government, through its tariff laws, which plunders the people, and the trusts, etc., are merely the machinery for doing it."

He said again:

"The true communism of pelf is the customs tariff bill. It says to the people, 'Here is the law we have enacted for your robbery. Do not complain of it, but do your utmost to attack and injure the machinery engaged in extracting from you what we legislate shall be taken from you.'"

He said again:

"Beyond a tariff for revenue and a tariff for equalizing against foreign bounties there is no excuse for giving to one industry a protection of 100 per cent, as against 4 per cent to another. The result is that the Government fleeces the community in the interest of some favored industry."

The sugar trust produces about 90 per cent of the total output of the country, and if run at full power could produce enough for the entire country and an excess of 20 per cent more.

OTHER IMPORTANT TRUSTS.

The following trusts are given in brief:

The American Locomotive Company incorporated in New York, with a capital of $50,000,000, a combination of ten companies.

The American Lumber Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $8,000,000, and the control of the principal cities in the Union.

The American Pipe Manufacturing Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with $5,000,000 capital, and owning twenty-eight subsidiary companies.

The American Smelting and Refining Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $50,000,000, controls 85 per cent of the lead and silver output of the country.

The American Tobacco Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $180,000,000, controls practically the entire manufactured tobacco business in the country.

The Republic Iron and Steel Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $25,000,000, controls a large number of companies in Pennsylvania, Alabama, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Minnesota.

The United States Rubber Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $40,000,000, has practical control of the whole country.

The American Cement Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $2,100,000, controls the six largest companies of the Union.

The American Chicle Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $6,000,000, controls the six great chewing-gum factories of the country.

The American Cotton Oil Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $20,237,000, controls sixteen of the largest cotton-seed oil concerns of the United States.

The American Hide and Leather Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $35,000,000, controls thirty-five of the great companies in the United States.

The American Ice Securities Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $20,000,000, controls the output of three large ice combines, the American Ice Company, the Knickerbocker Ice Company, and the Consolidated Ice Company.

The American Linseed Company, incorporated in New Jersey, with a capital of $16,750,000, controlling 85 per cent of the linseed-oil business of the country.

The Allis-Chalmers Company, incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital of $25,000,000, controlling five great companies in four different States.

The American Can Company, incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital of $88,000,000, controlling absolutely thirty-two companies and leasing twelve more.

The American Car Foundry Company, incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital of $60,000,000, being a consolidation of the eight principal car companies of the country.

But why enumerate further? Enough has been indicated to show that the United States is, of all countries of the globe, the most trust ridden. We have trusts on ice, on flour, on steel, meat, on cotton, oil, and on almost every conceivable article of manufactured goods.

In fact, the United States Government seems to be an organization of the trusts, for the trusts, and by the trusts. Moody's Manual for 1907 reports 1,466 industrial corporations, with a combined capital of $9,849,833,000.

One thousand and fifty-one of them have less than $5,000,000 capital each, or a combined capital of $1,606,658,000. The other 451 have a combined capital of $8,243,175,000.

Hon. CHARLES LITTLEFIELD, in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives in 1903, enumerated and had printed in the RECORD a list of trusts in which he enumerated something more than 480 with a combined capital of $9,231,136,698. He also enumerated about the same number of local and natural monopoly trusts having a combined capital of $4,519,579,819, making a grand total of trust capital of $13,750,000,000, or an ownership of fully one-eighth of the entire property of the country.

GENERAL REFLECTIONS.

The burden of the testimony before the Industrial Commission given by trust witnesses was that the principal object in the formation of every trust was an increase of profits.

Commissioner Smith, in his report to the President, estimated the net earnings of the Standard Oil trust from 1882 to 1906 at $790,000,000, and added the significant words "possibly much more." He charged that such profits could not have been secured honestly, and denied that the trust had reduced prices, but that on the contrary it had forced them up. In the testimony taken by the Government to dissolve the Standard Oil Trust, begun in New York last September, it was shown that the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, a feeble little corporation with but a capital of $1,000,000, cleared as profits in the year 1906 $10,516,082, or more than 1,000 per cent. It paid dividends of $4,495,500, or more than 450 per cent.

In seven years the parent company, the Standard Oil of New Jersey, with a capital of less than $100,000,000, cleared $490,315,934, or $70,000,000 a year, and paid in dividends $308,359,403, or more than $48,000,000 per annum. In the twenty-six years since the formation of the trust the profits were proven to have been over $900,000,000, or nearly $40,000,000 per annum.

From the richest fifty-one men of the United States, it appears that six men of this group, the oil group, own together $960,000,000, divided as follows:

John D. Rockefeller	$600,000,000
William Rockefeller	100,000,000
H. H. Rogers	100,000,000
Flagler	60,000,000
Archbold	50,000,000
Payne	50,000,000

This oil group of multimillionaires owns approximately $1,000,000,000 of the country's wealth. Six men of this trust coterie own approximately one-hundredth of all the wealth, real and personal, of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the report of the Commissioner of Corporations shows that the history and operation of the Standard Oil Company during the past thirty-five years has been one of substantial monopolization of the petroleum industry of the country, a deliberate destruction of competition, and a consequent control of that industry by less than twelve men, who have reaped enormous profits and to-day own more than a one-hundredth part of all the wealth of the country. And what is true of the Standard Oil trust is also true of the steel trust, the sugar trust, the lumber trust, and hundreds of other trusts.

Commissioner Smith, in his report to the President, charged that such profits as had been made by the trusts could not have been honestly made, and that the trusts had not reduced prices, but, on the contrary, had forced them up.

I represent a large agricultural and manufacturing district, and I know the people of my district have groaned under the burden imposed by the trusts. Take, for instance, the item of lumber. Every farmer of my district knows what effect the tariff on lumber and the formation of the lumber trust has had upon prices they are compelled to pay.

An investigation by Commissioner Smith shows that during the past ten years the prices of all kinds of lumber have steadily increased and that the diminishing supply is not entirely responsible for the increase. During 1906 the price of hemlock advanced $2; white pine, $3; yellow pine, $4; poplar, $5. In the last ten years the average price of maple has increased 17 per cent; oak, 36 per cent; quartered oak, 49 per cent; yellow pine, 65 per cent; poplar, 70 per cent; spruce, 74 per cent, and hemlock, 86 per cent.

The lumber trust is the most complete of all the great combinations. It is operated without a holding company or any other outward indication of being a monopoly. It fixes the prices for all lumber.

The operations of the trust are conducted through the hemlock, pine, hardwood, and other associations. Every branch of the business is covered by an association. Representatives of the various concerns meet every month and fix prices. Lists are prepared and sent out to customers. All competition has been eliminated by the lumber trust, acting under a "gentlemen's agreement." The capital of the trust, according to the late census, is $611,000,000. Lumber constitutes the fourth largest industry in the United States, being only surpassed by the steel and iron, the textile, and the meat-packing industries.

It has been demonstrated by the Bureau of Corporations that price lists sent out from different localities are identical. They are printed in the same type, turned out by the same press, and issued from a common center. These lists show that prices are the same in Minnesota, Arkansas, Illinois, Texas, Indiana, Missouri, Louisiana, Ohio, and in the other States.

The profits of the trust are shown to have been enormous. The value per thousand feet board measure of standing yellow pine timber, based on the highest price at which the Government sold its stumpage last year, was $4. The average cost of cutting and hauling the logs to the mill is $3.50. Any reasonably equipped sawmill can put the lumber in the yard for $1. An allowance of $1.50 brings the cost of the finished product up to $10 per thousand. This same lumber sold on the market during the last year at prices ranging from $35 to $38 per thousand feet.

The difference between the cost of production and the retail price, from $35 to $38 per thousand feet, represents the cost of transportation, the legitimate expense of handling the business, and what is considered an exorbitant profit for the trust. Reliable data estimates the trust profit to be at least 200 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the farmers and other consumers of lumber are growing tired of being robbed year after year by this heartless lumber trust, and it is for this House to say whether the tariff on lumber shall stand and the trust be permitted to prey upon the people.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that whenever any commodity falls in the hands of a trust it should be immediately placed on the free list. [Applause.] I doubt if you can find a Member of this House who will publicly defend the tariff on lumber or the powerful lumber trust, which controls the output and fixes the prices, yet you have permitted a bill I introduced in the House on the 17th day of January, repealing all duty on lumber, to lie in the Committee on Ways and Means without being reported, and I predict now it will never see the light of day. I confidently believe that if my bill to repeal the duty on lumber was submitted to a vote there is not a Member of this House would dare vote against it and then go home and face his constituents. There is one thing absolutely certain, if you did vote against it you would have to look to the trust for a job instead of the people you are now supposed to represent. [Applause.] So far as I am concerned, I want the RECORD to show that I am now ready and anxious to cast my vote for the repeal of the duty on lumber and the destruction of the lumber trust. If you deny me this opportunity to so vote, I shall see that my constituents are informed as to where the responsibility rests. I have carefully estimated the amount of lumber used by the people of my district, and I believe if you will pass my bill repealing the duty on lumber the people of my district will be saved more than $100,000 annually. And what is true of the lumber trust is also true of other trusts.

We are compelled to pay exorbitant prices for everything we buy. The trust greets the new-born babe as he sleeps in a trust-made cradle; it attends him through life, and when at last he dies he sleeps in a trust-made coffin. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are we going to do about it? Shall we repeal the duty on all trust-made goods and pass an antitrust law that will put them out of business, or shall we permit the duty to stand, and the Sherman antitrust makeshift to remain as the law of the land, under which they have all been organized and have built up colossal fortunes off the sweat and toil of the common people? No! God forbid that we should be so derelict in duty. Let us proceed at once to take this Government out of the hands of the trusts and place it in the hands of the people. There is but one way to do it, and that is to repeal the Dingley tariff on trust-made goods and pass an antitrust law that will give the Government the right to put a few trust magnates in the penitentiary. When this is done we will once more have a Government of, by, and for the people, and every man will have equal opportunities under the law. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill in this House, known as H. R. 18775, now in the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary, which, if enacted into law, will give the Government the power to drive every trust out of existence. I believe this bill is as nearly perfect as can be drawn; but if it is not, the committee has the right and the power to amend it. It is drawn for the purpose of suppressing trusts, corporations, pools, and conspiracies in restraint of trade, and provides that any corporation organized under the laws of the United States of America, or under the laws of any other country, and which transacts any business of an interstate or international character, shall not enter into any pool, conspiracy, or combination in restraint of trade without becoming liable to the penalties prescribed by this bill.

It also provides that any foreign corporation violating the provisions of this act shall be excluded from doing business in this country, and in the event of a violation by a domestic corporation, organized under the laws of the United States of America, its charter will be forfeited. Surely this Government has the right to say to a foreign corporation violating our law that it shall not do business in this country, and also has the right to take away the charter of a domestic corporation when it disregards the laws of the Government from which it procures its right to do business.

It further provides that no corporation organized for the purpose of forming a trust shall have the right to injure legitimate competition by selling goods for less than cost, or by giving them away, and shall not sell them at a less price in one section of the country than in another for the purpose of crushing out competition. It further provides that any corporation, trust or combination violating any of the provisions of this act shall be fined in any sum not less than $3,000 for each day's offense, and each day the violation continues shall be considered a separate offense. It not only provides a fine such as I have mentioned, but it also adds imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period of from one to ten years.

The penalty prescribed, Mr. Chairman, is the thing that will make this bill effective. The fine alone is not sufficient. What does a trust care for a fine, so long as they have the power to collect it off the people by increased prices on trust-made goods? It is the fear of imprisonment in the penitentiary that will compel obedience to the law. We have been teaching our children that petit larceny is disgraceful and that grand larceny is respectable, by sending the man to the penitentiary who steals a few dollars, while the man who steals millions is allowed to go free. Ah, Mr. Chairman, what we need to-day is a law that will punish the big thief as well as the little thief. [Applause.] If the millionaire violates the law, clothe him in stripes and put him behind the bars, just the same as you do the man without property who violates the law. Compel every man, no matter whether he lives in a cabin or a brownstone front to obey the commandment "Thou shalt not steal." [Applause.] I believe this bill will destroy every trust now doing business in this country, and I hope the committee will give the House an opportunity of voting for or against it. If there is a better bill before the committee than the one I have presented, I ask that it be reported. It makes no difference to me whose bill it is, or whether it is of Democratic or Republican origin, if its provisions are sufficient to suppress trusts, I am ready to vote for it. All I ask, Mr. Chairman, is that the rights of the people be protected, and that the day of special privilege be brought to an end. [Applause.] Coming, as I do, from the plain people, whose representative I am proud to be, as far as within my power lies I make this appeal for the purity and honesty of our Government and for justice and fair dealing to the individual citizen.

If I had my way about it, I would destroy all industrial trusts conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, and on their ruins I would build "a mighty trust in God," with 89,000,000 people as stockholders, each drawing a dividend more valuable than the combined dividends paid by all industrial trusts during the history of their existence. When such a trust is firmly established we will not need laws restraining men from injuring each other. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the memorial committee of the Grand Army of the Republic of New York City disagreeing with the recommendation of the Appropriation Committee in the matter of a single pension agency, which I heartily indorse. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolutions are as follows:

MEMORIAL COMMITTEE,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
New York, March 17, 1908.

To honorable United States Senators and Members of House of Representatives:

The memorial committee of the city of New York, boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, Queens, and Richmond, in meeting assembled, unanimously disagree with the proposition to discontinue the pension agencies throughout the country and the establishment of an agency in the city of Washington, and they do most earnestly urge in behalf of the comrades resident in our city that the United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from the State of New York use their influence and effort against the proposed law, and for a continuance of agencies as at present existing under the law.

GEO. B. LOUD, Chairman.
EDWARD J. ATKINSON, Secretary.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, the time has not arrived, in the judgment of many well-informed persons, when this action can be adopted by Congress. The large sums paid out quarterly, covering every section of the country, aside from the justice and equity of the payments, is a splendid distribution of money. It goes with every artery of trade, and has done much to make our country prosperous.

I am opposed to removing the various agencies through which these vast sums are and have been so satisfactorily distributed and hope that they will be retained. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCHENRY].

Mr. MCHENRY. Mr. Chairman, I beg your indulgence for a few moments this afternoon to call attention to H. R. 10556, introduced by me in the House of Representatives December 19, 1907, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

A bill (H. R. 10556) for the purpose of supplying relief and alleviating suffering incident to accidents in coal mines.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of supplying relief and alleviating suffering incident to accidents in coal mines within the territory of the United States there shall be organized in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be known as the "Bureau of Mines and Mining." Said Bureau shall consist of a Commissioner and such other employees as the work will require, with such limitations as Congress may from time to time prescribe.

The compensation of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Mines and Mining shall be $5,000 per annum; that of the principal assistant $2,500 per annum; clerks in the Bureau shall receive $1,800 per annum; the stenographer, $1,000 per annum, and a messenger $75 per month. These salaries and all other expenses of the Bureau of Mines and Mining shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor in the usual manner.

The Bureau of Mines and Mining shall have power to investigate as to the causes and effects of all accidents in coal mines and to afford such relief as the exigencies demand and the funds provided in this bill permit.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of alleviating the suffering and want in the families of miners who have been killed or injured by accidents in the mines, from whatever source, there shall be levied and collected from the owners and operators of coal mines a tax of 1 cent per ton on all coal mined within the United States on and after the passage of this act. Said tax shall be paid into the Treasury quarterly, and accompanying each payment there shall be a sworn statement of the mine operator as to the number of tons shipped from the mine the operation of which he directs during the previous three months.

The Bureau of Mines and Mining is hereby empowered to examine the books of any coal company or transportation company to determine the facts, in case of the allegation or complaint of fraud in the return, and in the event of the failure of any mine owner or operator, whether individual or corporation, to pay into the Treasury of the United States 1 cent per ton on the coal mined within the previous three months, the Bureau of Mines and Mining shall proceed to collect the said sum in accordance with the laws of the State in which the mine is located by legal process. Attorney fees, costs incurred in the process of collection, and a penalty of 100 per cent shall be added to the tax due if default in payment or false return of product compels resort to legal proceedings.

SEC. 3. That in case of the death or injury by accident of any employee of any coal mining operation in the United States while in the performance of his regular duties, a certificate of such death or injury shall be duly made out by the superintendent or manager of the mines. This certificate, which shall set forth all the facts in the case as far as obtainable, shall be signed by two reputable and responsible physicians and the mine inspector in charge of the mine where said accident shall have occurred and be sworn to before a notary public or justice of the peace.

The form of certificate shall be provided by the Bureau of Mines and Mining, and shall embody all details as to the manner of death or injury, the character, probable duration or permanency of the injury, number of persons dependent upon said employee, and a statement of the pecuniary and physical conditions of the family of such person.

On receipt of such information the Bureau of Mines and Mining shall issue a warrant equal to 40 per cent of the amount, which, in the judgment of the Commissioner of the Bureau, said claimant would be entitled to receive under the pro rata participation in the insurance fund and forward the same to the said beneficiary.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioner of the Bureau of Mines and Mining shall have full authority in the distribution of this fund in such manner as in his judgment shall appear to be fair and equitable to all participants. In making his estimate as to the amount of the emergency payment of 40 per cent he shall be governed by the average mortality statistics of the coal-mining industry of the United States during the preceding five years.

At the end of each fiscal year, which shall be made as of December 1, he shall convey to a commission, hereinafter provided for, all funds remaining in his hands after reimbursing the Treasury for all money drawn therefrom for emergency payments, compensation of officials and employees of the Bureau, and other expenses of maintenance.

Annually, on the assembling of Congress, the President shall name a commission consisting of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Mines and Mining, two Senators, and three Representatives in Congress, whose duty it shall be to apportion and distribute the remaining part of the fund among the claimants approved during the preceding twelve months. Ten per cent of the entire amount collected during the year shall be set aside for emergency purposes in the beginning of the new year and to meet exceptional calamities: Provided, however, That this reserve shall not exceed $500,000, and no family shall receive more than $1,000 out of the fund: Provided further, That no person shall be eligible to participate in the relief fund provided in this act whose injury is not of a permanently disabling character or which shall have incapacitated him from the performance of his usual duties for a period of less than six weeks, and for such temporary injuries he shall not receive from the fund herein provided a sum greater than 50 per cent of the amount he would have earned at his regular employment during the time of his disability.

SEC. 5. That the commissioners appointed to apportion and distribute the fund shall receive no compensation for their labor, though actual expenses incurred in the performance of the duty shall be paid out of the fund.

SEC. 6. That the owner, manager, or operator of a mine in which an accident occurs shall not in any instance collect from the wages of any miner or other employee any part of the tax required by the provision of this act, and the violation of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

I desire to bring to this Congress this afternoon a message from a class of people who seldom come here for favors and much less frequently get them when they do come; a class which ranks second in the production of our national wealth and through whose direct physical energy the commercial forces of our country are vitalized; a class whose labor contributes both to the comfort and prosperity of our people to such an extent as to merit the deliberation of this House in the interest of the coal miners of the United States.

While it is true that this bill carries a special interest, yet it is equally true that the interests and welfare of these miners are inseparably interwoven with the interests of our great American people, and I propose to prove—

First. That the bill comes within constitutional limits.

Second. It is sound in principle from an economic standpoint.

Third. It is right from a moral and humanitarian standpoint.

As to the need of the establishment of a Bureau of Mines and Mining, I beg leave to call your attention to the recommendations set forth in the President's message on the opening of the Sixtieth Congress, which reads as follows:

MINING.

A Bureau of Mines should be created under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Interior; the Bureau to have power to collect statistics and make investigations in all matters pertaining to mining, and particularly to the accidents and dangers of the industry. If this can not now be done, at least additional appropriations should be given the Interior Department to be used for the study of mining conditions, for the prevention of fraudulent mining schemes, for carrying on the work of mapping the mining districts, for studying methods for minimizing the accidents and dangers in the industry; in short, to aid in all proper ways the development of the mining industry.

The need of said Bureau is further emphasized in the annual report of the Department of the Interior, from which I quote as follows:

The figures given in this report indicate that during the year 1906 nearly 7,000 men were killed or injured in the coal mines of this country and that the number of these accidents caused directly or indirectly by mine explosions has been steadily increasing. It is also indicated that this increase has been due in part to the lack of proper and enforceable mine regulations; in part to the lack of reliable information concerning the explosives used in mining and the conditions under which they can be used safely in the presence of the gas and dust encountered in the mines, and in part to the fact that in the development of coal mining not only is the number of miners increasing, but many areas from which coal is being taken are either deeper or farther from the entrance, where good ventilation is more difficult and the dangerous accumulations of explosive gas more frequent.

The increase both in the number and in the seriousness of mine explosions in the United States during past years may be expected to continue unless, through investigations made in the United States such as have proved effective in other coal-producing countries, information can be obtained and published concerning the explosives used, the conditions under which they may be used safely in the presence of coal dust or gas, and the general conditions which make for health and safety in coal-mining operations. Such information, obtained through comprehensive and impartial investigations, may serve in this, as in other countries, as an intelligent basis both for legislative enactments and for agreements among persons associated with mining operations.

One after another of these terrible underground disasters awakens the sympathies of the nation and arouses an earnest desire that they may be entirely prevented. Experience in the deeper and more dangerous coal mines of Belgium and other countries not only indicates that these mine accidents may be reduced to less than one-third their present number in the United States, but also gives promise of results which in the future may at least approach complete prevention.

In extending my inquiries into this matter I have found a condition of accident mortality existing in the coal-mining industry of which the average citizen has but little knowledge. Our country has grown to such vast proportions and our race for dollars in this commercial age has become so intense that the loss of a life here or a hundred there produces but a passing thought except to those upon whom the burden of calamity directly falls. To such an alarming extent have these disasters grown, increasing in ratio as per thousand men employed each year instead of decreasing, which I shall conclusively prove by figures gleaned from reliable sources, that the fatalities in this line of industry have assumed such proportions as to merit the efforts of the National Government in the interest of humanity to bring to bear this instrument of the people, our Government, for the protection of our workingmen while in the pursuance of this hazardous employment.

We boast of our wonderful progress as a nation in a commercial way, but we seldom stop to count the cost, especially when that cost is estimated in human lives, and to those men who are now framing argument in their minds, conjuring illusions of paternalism, unconstitutionality, and innumerable other means known only to skilled legislators in accomplishing the defeat of a measure before this House, I ask you in all earnestness that before opposing this measure to give fair consideration to the facts which I shall now give you. I regret that I have not been able up to this time to procure full reports for the year 1907. During the past seventeen years the number of men killed in the coal mines of the United States is as follows:

1892	859	1902	1,828
1893	965	1903	1,794
1894	957	1904	1,999
1895	1,057	1905	2,097
1896	1,120	1906	2,061
1897	947
1898	1,049	Total	22,840
1899	1,243

Showing a total number of 22,840 men killed during this time, and I invite your special attention to the fact that during the past six years the number of fatal accidents have practically doubled over the preceding eleven years.

It will be urged by mine owners that this increase of fatality is due to a greater number of employees, but I again invite your attention to the following schedule, which shows—

Number of men killed in the coal mines of the United States for each 1,000 men employed.

1895	2.67	1901	3.24
1896	2.79	1902	3.49
1897	2.34	1903	3.14
1898	2.59	1904	3.38
1899	2.98	1905	3.53
1900	3.24	1906	3.40

From these figures you will observe that in 1895 the ratio killed per 1,000 men employed was 2.67, and, wtih an almost continually increased ratio, reaching the enormous fatality of 3.40 per thousand in 1906, and with every probability that this rate will be increased when the data is collected for 1907.

We might be persuaded and willing to accept these conditions as unavoidable were it not for the fact that in European countries the number of deaths per thousand employees are undergoing a marked decrease instead of increase, as in this country. We are naturally unwilling to concede that Europe can surpass us in any form of business management or in the enactment of laws for the betterment of the common people, but as honest legislators we must accept facts and conditions as they are, and if those facts and conditions prove our own theories and practice to be wrong, we should have the courage to throw off our American egotism and adopt the practice of those countries who have the mortality of mine operation reduced. If it were merely a question of dollars the matter would not be one worthy of consideration by the House of Congress, but it is a question of human life and is therefore within the province of the National Government to take upon itself the performance of its obligation toward the well-being of our people.

The following figures show the number of men killed for each thousand employed in the coal mines of Belgium:

Gradual reduction in death rate since 1860 to 1906, from 3.28 to 1.02, or less than one-third the number of men killed as compared with earlier years.

Great Britain: Mortality rate from 1894 to 1906 reduced from 1.60 to 1.29 per 1,000 men.

Prussia: Mortality rate from 1880 to 1904 reduced from 2.94 to 1.80 per 1,000 men employed.

France: From 1901 to 1905 mortality rate reduced from 1.03 to 0.84.

The full significance of these figures can best be determined by an examination of this comparative summary of the—

Number of men killed for each 1,000 men employed—averages for five years.

France (1901–1905)	0.91
Belgium (1902–1906)	1.00
Great Britain (1902–1906)	1.28
Prussia (1900–1904)	2.06
United States (1902–1906)	3.39

I do not believe that any law or condition can be devised to remove entirely the loss of life through accidents in coal mines or in any other form of manufacturing activities, nor can men be protected by law against their own carelessness or of the carelessness or mistakes of their fellow-employees; but any person who is willing to investigate the reports of the physical conditions of the coal-mining industry of the world and leaves his mind open to conviction will be forced to the conclusion that, in so far as protecting the lives of their miners, the Europeans have progressed much more rapidly than we in the United States. In the further consideration of this subject it is well to carry our inquiry into the causes of mine accidents, and we find that in 1906 the causes of the fatal and nonfatal accidents in the coal mines of the United States were as follows:

Coal-mine accidents in the United States, 1906.

Accidents due to—	Killed.	Injured.
Gas and dust explosions	228	307
Powder explosions	80	215
Falls of roof and coal	1,008	1,863
Other causes	732	2,192

It will be noted that 50 per cent of all the fatal accidents and 39 per cent of all the nonfatal accidents were the result of falls of roof and coal, and that accordingly these are the most prolific sources of accidents in the coal mines of the United States. The following statement of deaths from this cause per 1,000 men employed shows how the United States compares with several of the foreign coal-producting countries in this regard:

Deaths from falls of roof and coal per 1,000 men employed.

Belgium	0.40
France	.47
Great Britain	.64
Germany	.92
United States	1.70

To extend our inquiry further into the causes of mine accidents or to suggest remedies would be superficial upon our part, as the suggestion of a remedy is subject-matter for the mine expert exclusively and the Bureau of Mines herein provided. I have merely invited your attention to the consideration of these figures to prove—

First. That there is evidently something wrong with our coal-mining industry.

Second. That what foreign countries have accomplished in reducing the fatal accidents of the coal-mining industry we ought to be able to accomplish in the United States.

Third. The appalling loss of life is sufficient to justify governmental aid.

But it is argued by gentlemen, and I believe with all sincerity, that a measure such as I propose is unconstitutional, and that Congress has power to levy tax only for the purpose of raising revenue. The fact is, however, that almost from the beginning Congress has been levying and Government officials collecting tax, not for revenue but for protection, and that in making the levy revenue was not even contemplated.

The protectionists justify high-tariff schedules on the ground that they contribute to the "common defense and the general welfare of the United States." The authority to tax is conveyed in the first paragraph of the eighth section of Article I of the Federal Constitution, which reads as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have never been quite able to bring my mind into acquiescence with an interpretation of this language to justify the imposing of vast burdens upon the majority of the people in order that unearned largesses may be paid to a few. It has always seemed to me that this is an atrocious abuse of the taxing power. Recently the President of the National Association of Manufacturers, a Mr. Van Cleave, in a statement made in this city, declared that "It is estimated by competent authorities that the graft, overcharge, and wrong done to the American public because of the present tariff reaches three million ($3,000,000) dollars a working day." This vast sum of money does not go into the Treasury of the United States. It goes into the pockets of the trust barons or into the vaults of the favored trusts.

Now, if it is constitutional and lawful that nine hundred million ($900,000,000) dollars may be collected annually from the earnings of American industry for the enrichment of a limited number of rich men, why is it not possible to collect a much smaller sum annually to relieve the wants and alleviate the sufferings of poor men in vastly greater number? If adding to the wealth of a few already rich promotes "the general welfare," it seems to me that educating and feeding the children of unfortunate men who have suffered death or permanent injury in coal-mine calamities will achieve the same result. It is universally agreed that education adds both to the value and standard of citizenship. It must be admitted that with the fathers of these families removed or disabled, it will be impossible for them to acquire the educational advantages essential to the highest standard of good citizenship. Therefore I hold, Mr. Chairman, that if Congress has power to levy and collect tariff taxes, not for revenue, but for "the protection of the American manufacturers," it has power to levy and collect a meager sum from a profitable industry to qualify a great host of children to exercise the highest duties of citizenship.

If it is held that the exercise of one of these taxing powers is constitutional, it must be admitted that the exercise of the other is equally valid. The education of the children of coal miners is of greater value to the country than the development of the vicious natures of the idle rich and the pampered sons of millionaires, and I shall insist that either taxation for protection of manufacturers be abandoned or that taxation for the alleviation of the sufferings of worthy unfortunates be begun.

To hide behind the Constitution and to plead paternalism has long been the playground of predatory interests. If you agree with me that the principles embodied in this bill are meritorious, and surely there is no gentleman in this House or any American citizen worthy of the name who would raise one word of objection to levying this paltry tax of 1 cent per ton on coal, even though he were obliged to pay the 1 cent per ton on the amount of coal he used. Then taking it for granted that you agree that the law would be a good law, and granted further that it may be unconstitutional in its present form, then I invite your cooperation to help amend the bill in order that it may pass favorably under the scrutinizing eye of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the last analysis the power of constitutionality rests with the Supreme Court, so the final interpretation of our laws is largely a question of human judgment. Take, for instance, the decision of the Supreme Court upon the question of the income tax; four of the distinguished members of the Supreme Court agreed that the income tax was constitutional, five members of the court affirmed that it was not constitutional; thus we see a great principle of government resting upon the final determination of one man.

Had five members of the Supreme Court voted for the income tax instead of four, the income tax would have been declared constitutional and would now be a law, and placing a portion of the burden of taxation rightfully where it belongs. So, I repeat, that the interpretation of law and Constitution resolves itself more frequently into a question of human judgment rather than a technical knowledge of the law. If, however, the lawyers in this body, for whose opinion I have the most profound respect, agree that in its present form my bill is unconstitutional, then I am willing to have it changed, provided the three underlying purposes of the bill are not destroyed or are accomplished in another way.

First. The establishment of a bureau of mines and mining for the purpose of bringing to the aid of both mine owners and workers correct information from the scientific mine operators of the Old World, which up to this time has either not been available to the average mine owner or, if available, has not been applied.

Second. To provide moneys for carrying on this work and collecting said money from the industry itself without taking it from the people's Treasury, which represents, under our present system, real estate and tariff taxation and a direct toll upon the necessities of life and upon the producer.

Third. To provide money for the alleviation of suffering as the result of mine accidents and for the education of the helpless orphan children.

I frankly admit that the third section is the bone of constitutional objection, from the lawyer's standpoint. Remove it, if you think it necessary to preserve the constitutionality of the bill, provided that in doing so it is fairly understood by present Members and the American public that the money collected by this tax shall go into the General Treasury, and that this and future Congresses shall appropriate a sum equivalent to the amount collected for the purposes set forth in the bill. In any event, I ask that the bill be reported out for debate and vote in the House, and if there are any objections in the minds of gentlemen, let the Supreme Court decide the matter. We will have at least called to the direct attention of the States a suggestion for their consideration.

It has been urged that a measure of this kind is distinctly a province of the State, but, like every other form of insurance, the greater the numbers the lighter the burden. For instance, a half dozen men could not insure each other's life upon an economical basis, but several thousand men can enter into a form of mutual life insurance, except coal miners, who are debarred from insuring their lives in the ordinary commercial insurance companies, upon a basis that is economically sound and provide for their estate a future competence. So it is with the States as compared with the United States on a proposition of this kind. A great calamity in any one State, such as we have recently had in the past few months, both in Pennsylvania and West Virginia, would be amply provided for out of the general fund under this bill without placing a burden upon any individual, whereas the single State could not operate under this law so advantageously as through the medium of the Federal Government.

Now, we come to the old-time campaign cry of paternalism, and the bill is objected to by gentlemen because it is paternal. Did those gentlemen vote for the establishment of a Federal pure-food law, and if so, are they now sorry for having voted for it? It is paternal. Did the gentlemen who now object to paternalism, vote in favor of the Interstate Railway Commission, and if so, are they sorry that they supported the measure? It is directly paternal. Do gentlemen oppose this measure because of its paternalism, object to mail service, or establishment of parcels post, or postal savings bank, or of the tariff, all of which represent various phases of paternalism? The question for Members of Congress to determine in the near future is not whether we shall have paternalism, for it has been with us for a long time, but it is important for us to decide whether paternalism of the National Government shall be in the interests of the trusts and corporate wealth or in the interests of the common people who form the foundation of our Government, and from whose physical energy must come the production of all wealth.

The cry of paternalism holds no fear for me when applied to the general welfare of a great people, and when we come to count the cost of industrial production, there must be a new column entered upon our national balance sheet of the future, to record the number of lives sacrificed. The captains of industry, who have charge of the coal mines of the United States, doubtless have, through the combination of railroads and mines in violation of the law, been able to show larger profits than the European mine operator, but neither the stockholders nor the consumers of the coal know the cost of the production in human lives and suffering. I am now going to give you this information. For every one million tons of coal mined in the United States during the past five years a percentage of 6.04 human lives have been sacrificed per each million tons mined and this does not include the thousands injured, or enough human blood and tears to sprinkle every ton of coal we use.

A few weeks ago I called on a sick friend in a Pennsylvania hospital. He had been reading about the proposed miners' bill. He said to me:

> I hope you will use all the energy that God has given you to persuade your colleagues to enact this proposed measure into a law, for there is not a day or a night passes in this hospital but what some poor, mangled sufferer is brought here from the mines for treatment, and while the hospital authorities do the best they can to give them prompt and good attention, yet it remains a fact undeniable that because of the extreme poverty of many victims they do not receive the prompt and careful attention they would otherwise receive. The statement seems unbelievable, but so accustomed and hardened does the average hospital emergency staff become to the numerous mining accidents that a crushed limb or a broken body brings forth scarcely a word of comment or a heart throb of compassion.

Mr. Speaker, I have already occupied more time than I expected to in the presentation of this measure. There is one argument, however, upon which I have not yet touched. In the enactment of laws from a humanitarian standpoint the question of dollars is the basest of all forms of argument, but it necessarily becomes a part of every public question, and I feel that I can not with fairness to the subject forego a statement in this connection.

The time has come in the history of human events and in the progress of the American nation when greater emphasis must be fixed upon what has heretofore been a somewhat neglected, though the greatest, asset of our nation, and that is the lives and happiness of our men and women who toil.

A tax of 1 per cent per ton on all coal mined in the United States will produce an annual fund of $4,000,000, or sufficient to provide an insurance fund of $1,000 for the family of each man killed and about $300 for each person injured—based upon mine accident statistics of the past five years.

When we add to the natural mortality rate the additional death and accident rate of ten men in every thousand employed, we practically lessen the miners' chance of longevity by one-half. In other words the three score year and ten rule of the average is reduced to thirty-five years for the average miner's life, by reason of the life-sapping employment itself and the increased fatalities due to accidents. Thus we see the productive energy of a vast army of men cut off at an early age.

During the past seventeen years there have been over 75,000 miners killed and injured by accident, leaving over 100,000 children without protection. Had the law which I now propose been in force during this time there would have been collected about $40,000,000, or an average of about $500 for each person.

Now, I think gentlemen will agree with me that, with our mines so equipped with the life-saving apparatus and the scientific skill applied to mine management as to have reduced our mortality record to a par with the mines of Europe, the percentage of lives saved and injuries avoided would have given to the country an increase credit asset from the labor of these men to have repaid many times over on our national balance sheet the sum collected in this insurance tax.

Mr. Chairman, thus far I have confined myself to a practical and strict business presentation of the case and have studiously refrained from any sentimental expression in the advocacy of this measure. I can not, however, withhold an appeal for the helpless widows and children of these stricken coal miners.

True, the world is full of sorrow and suffering, and it is both impossible and impracticable that the National Government should undertake its alleviation. But here is a condition without a parallel both as to the need, the practicability, and justification of governmental protection.

Congress and State legislatures are much exercised over the enactment of laws for the prohibition of child labor. Where the father is living and in good health there can be no excuse for the employment of child labor; but where the father has been removed by death, either by natural or accidental causes, the widowed mother in many cases finds herself unable to supply the family wants from her own labor alone and she must choose between the ignominy of public charity or the necessity of placing her little ones out to toil.

We spend millions upon millions of dollars for the protection of favored industries that a few rich men may make more money. This bill asks for the collection of an annual fund of $4,000,000 that these 100,000 miners' children may be educated to become useful citizens and that their growing youth may be spared the dwarfing influence of performing men's labor.

Let us help lift the embargo of child slavery from their young shoulders that their little souls may enjoy to some degree the freedom and beauties of childhood; that their little bodies and minds may grow straight and strong into noble citizenship, and bring to the widowed mother that help which she so greatly needs and which we can so easily give her.

Do this, and there will come an echoing response of gratitude from the hearts of the American people who feel a human interest in their fellows, and who know that the forces of American industry and of all productive energy, whether of the mine, the farm, or the mill, are so closely allied that any law which works a beneficent influence to any part or class of our productive organization without imposing a burden upon others reflects an indirect benefit to all mankind.

And from the miner and his family will come the daily silent prayer of thanksgiving for the blessings of a Government which holds the liberty and the life of her citizens as matters of first and lasting importance, instilling into the hearts and minds of all who toil a patriotic love of country second only to love of God and of home. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr RAUCH].

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened for a long time to those who are older in years and service in the House than myself, hoping to hear more on certain subjects which I believe to be of considerable importance to the people of this country and which are likely to become questions of great concern to many Members in this body. With your indulgence, I wish to call your attention to certain facts which are undoubtedly within your knowledge, but which may not have received your careful consideration.

In accordance with that section of the Constitution which provides that—

> The President shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient—

Mr. Roosevelt sent a special message to the Senate and House of Representatives on January 31, 1908, recommending for their immediate consideration the following measures. He said:

> First. As regards the employers' liability law, I advocate its immediate reenactment limiting its scope so that it shall apply only to that class of cases as to which the courts say it can constitutionally apply, but strengthening its provision within this scope.
> Second. I also very urgently advise that a comprehensive act be passed providing for compensation by the Government to all the employees injured in Government service.
> Third. I again call your attention to the need of some action in connection with the abuse of injunctions in labor cases.
> Fourth. There should also be such action on laws to better secure control over the great business concerns engaged in interstate commerce and especially over the great common carriers.
> Fifth. The Interstate Commerce Commission should be provided with the means to make a physical valuation of any road as to which it deems this valuation necessary.
> Sixth. The law should correct that portion of the Sherman Act which prohibits all combinations—whether they be reasonable or unreasonable.
> Seventh. With measures to restrain stock watering and overcapitalization there should be measures taken to prevent at least the grosser forms of gambling in securities and commodities.
> Eighth. Moreover there should be no delay in supplementing the laws now on the statute books by the enactment of further legislation as outlined in the message I sent to Congress on its assembling.

Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to show that the Republican majority of this House is not with the President; that certain elements in the Republican party are so hopelessly in opposition to other elements that it is impossible for them to carry into effect the recommendations made in this message; that if the people of this country ever expect to see the principles set out in this message enacted into law and on the statute books, operating as real reforms, they must look to the party that gave them birth.

That this Congress is not with the President is proven by the fact that there has been no attempt to enact his recommendations into law. That certain elements are diametrical in their opposition is proven by the utterances and accusations of each. Harriman and his crowd say that the President is responsible for the panic, and the President and his crowd say that the others are responsible for the panic. One crowd says it is the result of stock watering and stock gambling, and the other says it is the result of repeated expressions from the Chief Executive that has destroyed the confidence of the public in all stocks.

It is not our quarrel, and, to borrow an expression from the gentleman from Missouri, "It does not become an innocent bystander to say which is to blame." The charges are laid at the door of each. One is charged with bringing such conditions and practices into existence and the other with permitting them not only to exist, but to grow, accepting campaign contributions from their source. The one is for offering worthless securities for sale and the other, by ultrasensational statements, damaging the sale of all securities. The agitation that has shaken this country to its very center should result in something more promising than the terrible cloud of uncertainty which now hangs like a pall over us. A refusal to act only aggravates the situation. It causes hesitation by the merchant who has goods to buy; lack of confidence in the man who has money to deposit; hoarding by the bank that has money to loan; discouragement of labor, which can not hope to thrive, and misery to those whose employment is gone.

Mr. Chairman, we receive a message from the President saying that we are in immediate need of certain legislation in the way of reform. A Republican Congress sits in inactivity and Members are not even given an opportunity to vote on these measures. I believe that the people of this country have a right to know whether a Republican Congress stands for the thing which our President proposes, and they have a right to know not only how Members talk, but how they vote on these measures. [Applause.]

I do not see what good can come from a President sending messages to Congress picturing a state of society that is awful and urging that they enact certain laws, while this body sits idly by, the Republicans making speeches in favor of the President, yet refusing to accept his recommendations.

Mr. Chairman, he has proposed great things, but how many of his recommendations have been enacted into law? Under his Administration have the people found relief from what he has designated "Every form of violence, corruption, and fraud, from murder to bribery, and ballot-box stuffing in politics?"

Mr. Chairman, I regret that such a confusion of purposes exists. It may result in indefinite delay in bringing about the enactment of laws which we really need. At the present time the Republicans by their promises bid us hope, but by their actions they condemn us to despair. Nor does their picture of the future present a more pleasant view, because if the legatee of the President, Mr. Taft, should be installed at the White House he could not make a stronger demand in a message to Congress, nor could this body ignore it more completely.

Mr. Chairman, he speaks of the oppression of the wage-workers by predatory wealth, and says that he is trying to secure an "equal opportunity for all." If that doctrine finds its complete sense in the expression, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," it is a noble work, fit to occupy the lifetime of any man.

Men appear upon the stage of action and pass away. The principles of eternal justice remain forever. They are not born nor do they die. They have been inscribed on the banners of thousands of men who have fought the fight which the President now at the close of his second and last term claims to be fighting. History tells us that Thomas Jefferson had grown old in that fight before the President was born. Our own knowledge tells us that before he was known as a figure of such national importance the Democrats had secured astounding revelations that enabled him in his last days as Chief Executive of the United States to see and to speak of the usurpations of predatory wealth.

Mr. Chairman, I am with the President when he says turn on the light. The same light that discloses stock gambling and watering in Wall street should disclose the record of a Republican Congress in Washington. The same light that shows the violation of law and abuse of human right throughout the land should show how far Congress has gone to apply the remedies suggested to correct those abuses. The recommendations of the President are far-reaching and his demand for action immediate. He says that gambling and stock watering should be stopped. What record has Congress made on that subject with the exception of a few speeches? There should be one, because the business man, the banker, the farmer, and the manufacturer have a right to know if the money of this country is to be again enticed into investment in stocks of fictitious value, or whether it must find its investment in things of actual worth.

What record have we upon the law of injunctions? Bills have been introduced, but none reported on the floor of this House for a vote. He says there should be a modification of the law of injunctions. Has there been any? Has there been any bill of this kind reported on the floor of this House for a vote? Certain interests may know, but labor also has a right to know what the vote of this House would be on that question. Yet one remains as silent as the tomb and the other waits in vain for the relief that never comes.

He says that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the means to make a physical valuation of a railroad. Has this question been decided by Congress? No. Yet even the stockholder in a railroad has a right to know whether the basis of value of his stock is to be the earning capacity or the cost of production of this property.

Mr. Chairman, the President has said that "every one of these laws, if enacted, would represent a part of the campaign against privilege." Democrats have not opposed the passage of these measures.

Mr. Chairman, why should we not legislate against these evils? All is in readiness. We have had investigations and have secured facts that are a basis for legislation. Recommendations have been made by the Chief Executive of the United States. Bills have been introduced and referred to the various committees. Members have been waiting for an opportunity to ballot on these measures. Will that opportunity be given? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL].

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the pending bill (H. R. 16268) I wish to express some views of my own in opposition to that portion of it which provides for the consolidation in Washington of the pension agencies located throughut the country, and wish also to present the views of others in opposition to the same portion of the bill. I sincerely hope the committee will reject this provision of the bill, and thus set the seal of its disapproval on a proposition to be parsimonious with a class of our fellow-citizens who deserve at the hands of their grateful fellow-countrymen a far different kind of treatment.

This measure affects 55,000 pensioners on the pension roll of the New York agency, through which payments are made to pensioners residing in the northern part of New Jersey, and this fact explains my particular interest in the measure before us. The total number of pensioners in the State of New Jersey is about 20,000.

These agencies were established for the convenience of the Government in handling the large volume of business in the Pension Department which could not be expeditiously discharged through one office. The system has been conducive to the prompt and efficient payment of the pensioner, and hence to his comfort, convenience, and needs.

While it may be true that the time will come when the change suggested will have to be made, it is extremely obvious that the time has not come yet and will not arrive for a very long period. There are as many pensioners on the roll to-day as there were fifteen years ago.

This attempt at economy seems ill timed, and the effect of it will be to upset and destroy a Department which is now in satisfactory running order, besides adding hardship to the old veterans themselves, whose past services should entitle them to generous treatment and many of whom would be thrown out of employment if this measure were enacted.

Recently the house of assembly in New Jersey passed a resolution opposing the change proposed, and the matter has been condemned by resolution by many Grand Army posts throughout the country.

I have here a letter written on the subject by the pension agent of Philadelphia, and, since it deals with the proposition in a well-ordered and exhaustive manner, I submit it for reading in preference to any remarks of my own, confident that if it is considered by the Members the proposed change will be seen to be detrimental and that it will be rejected by the committee. [Applause.]

I herewith append as a part of my remarks the following letter:

Letter of inquiry from Hon. Boies Penrose, United States Senator, relative to the abolition of pension agencies, and reply of St. Clair A. Mulholland, United States pension agent, Philadelphia, Pa.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICES AND POST-ROADS,
January 18, 1908.

Gen. ST. CLAIR A. MULHOLLAND,
United States Pension Agent, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR GENERAL: I inclose herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, relative to the proposed reduction in the number of pension agencies, and, as you are an experienced officer of the Pension Bureau, I will be glad if you will give me your reasons why this proposed change by the honorable Secretary of the Interior should not be made.

Yours, truly,

BOIES PENROSE.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES PENSION AGENCY,
Philadelphia, Pa., January 25, 1908.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, inclosing a copy of a communication from the honorable Secretary of the Interior under date of December 13, 1907, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, designated as Document No. 352, in which the honorable Secretary submits a proposal to reduce the number of pension agencies from eighteen to one.

In compliance with your request to furnish a statement of my reasons why this proposed change should not be made, I respectfully invite your attention to the following facts, which appear to me to be conclusive in showing that consolidation and concentration of the pension agency service at Washington, D. C., by the reduction of the number of pension agencies from eighteen to one, will not result in more economic or more efficient execution of the laws pertaining to the payment of pensions. On the other hand, it will inevitably result in not only largely increased cost to the Government; but, what is equally important, it will impose upon the 900,000 pensioners peculiar hardships, delays, and inconvenience.

Objection is made to the proposed plan of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, as being (1) expensive; and (2) impracticable; and attention is respectfully invited to the following considerations:

1. The honorable Secretary asserts that the adoption of his plan would result in an annual saving to the Government of at least $200,000 and, perhaps, $25,000 more.

OBJECTIONS.

(a) The Secretary fails to furnish an exhibit whereby to show how such a saving would be possible. If it be possible to arrive at such a result, it surely is practicable to set forth in detail the facts and figures upon which such computation is based. This the Secretary significantly fails to do.

(b) The only possible reduction in the cost of paying pensions according to the plan proposed would be accomplished by the saving of the salaries of the eighteen pension agents, amounting annually to $72,000, and of $4,500 for rent paid by the New York agency. The first item to offset (at least, partially) this saving would be the necessary appointment of a number of high-salaried clerks (chiefs of divisions) who would be charged with the work and responsibilities of disbursing approximately $140,000,000 annually. Persons who would be competent to assume such responsibility would not be willing to do so without commensurate compensation. They would, in fact, if not in name, be pension agents. Each United States pension agent is now bonded in the sum of at least $75,000. The largest amount disbursed by any one pension agent for the year ended June 30, 1907, was $15,855,044.33. The Commissioner of Pensions is not a bonded disbursing officer of the Government. It is more than probable that, if he be asked to assume the added responsibilities of paying annually $140,000,000 for pensions, he will be granted additional compensation; or, if some other officer be designated to pay all pensions, a suitable salary would be paid such officer.

The second consideration to offset the saving of pension agents' salaries is the fact that the present per capita cost of paying pensions by the pension agencies now located outside of the city of Washington, D. C., is less by $302.73 per annum for each clerk employed than the per capita cost of granting pensions by the Bureau of Pensions. In other words, the clerks in these pension agencies receive an average annual salary of $977.99, whereas the clerks in the Bureau of Pensions receive an annual average salary of $1,280.72, a difference in economy in favor of the pension agencies of $302.73 for each clerk. If the 432 clerks now in the agency service should receive the same average salaries as are paid to clerks in the Bureau of Pensions it would cost the Government for clerk hire $125,425.60 more than it now does. Does the Secretary of the Interior anticipate that the clerks in the division of the Bureau to which should be assigned the payment of pensions will be paid per capita $302.73 per year less than clerks in other divisions? Surely the financial responsibility of paying pensions is immeasurably greater than that involved in merely granting them. The present practice of the Department of holding financially responsible the pension agents and their clerks for erroneous payments, while not holding the Bureau clerks responsible for erroneous allowances, is ample evidence of this. And justice demands that clerks assuming such financial responsibility should receive adequate compensation, as much, at least, as those who are relieved of such responsibility. Or does the honorable Secretary contemplate the possibility of disbursing $140,000,000 per year without placing the financial responsibility upon anybody? A revolutionary change, surely!

To summarize:

Average salaries paid to clerks in the Bureau of Pensions, per annum	$1,280.72
Average salaries in pension agencies, not including the agency at Washington, D. C., for clerk hire, per annum	977.99
Difference per capita	302.73
Increased cost for clerk hire annually in the payment of pensions at Bureau rate	125,425.60

(c) To further demonstrate the futility of the Secretary's plan to effect a more economical administration of the laws relating to the payment of pensions, attention is invited to the fact that the average annual per capita salary paid to clerks in the pension agency located in Washington, D. C., is $232.78 in excess of the average annual salary paid to clerks in the remaining seventeen agencies.

Average salaries paid to clerks in the Washington Pension Agency per annum	$1,210.77
Average salaries at other agencies	997.99
Difference per capita	232.78

And further, during the present fiscal year, while a large number of allowances under the act of February 6, 1907, was being made by the Bureau, the Washington Pension Agency, which received but one-half as many of such allowances to pay as a number of other agencies, was granted a detail of seven extra clerks from the Bureau, while the other seventeen agencies were required to do as much, and in some instances twice as much, work without a single extra clerk.

Surely these facts do not indicate that economy would result from such a plan as the Secretary proposes. Computing upon the basis of the average annual salaries paid in the Bureau, the cost would be $48,925.60 greater than it is now, after eliminating all pension agents' salaries and $4,500 for rent paid by the New York City agency. Economy, on the other hand, if it could be accomplished at all, would be accomplished by consolidating all the agencies outside of the city of Washington rather than in the Bureau of Pensions.

(d) Evidently the Secretary contemplates that additional saving may be accomplished by the introduction of labor-saving machines and a general revision and improvement of the routine work of paying pensions. This remains yet to be demonstrated. It is in only an experimental state at present; but this may be said, and said with confidence, in view of the facts and figures set forth above, that any reduction in cost of routine work by the use of mechanical devices or by improvement of methods can be as readily and as satisfactorily accomplished in the agency service, by those familiar with the work, as it can be in the Bureau, and at a lesser cost.

(c) With reference to the question of decreased cost to the Government, attention is also invited to the fact that the payment of all pensioners from Washington would involve an enormous increase in work (and consequent expense) at the post-office in that city. Making a moderate estimate for incidental correspondence, which would be very considerable, the payment of pensions by the Bureau would require the handling by the Washington post-office of 10,000,000 additional pieces of mail matter annually. This could not be done without greatly added expense to the Government. Nor would this be offset by decreased expenses at post-offices in cities where agencies are now located. The work of no one post-office would be much reduced, but the work of the Washington post-office would be greatly increased.

2. The Secretary states that equally prompt and efficient payment of pensions could be accomplished by the Commissioner of Pensions as by eighteen agencies.

OBJECTIONS.

(a) He does not assert that such payment by the Commissioner of Pensions could or would be any more prompt or efficient. Hence there is no improvement anticipated. The ability of the Commissioner of Pensions to even equal the agencies is, at best, problematical. It remains to be demonstrated.

(b) Even if payment of pensions can be accomplished as promptly and as efficiently by the Bureau, it can not be done as economically. The work now done by the Bureau is not, and how this could be does not appear.

(c) But it is exceedingly doubtful whether payment of pensions by the Bureau can be accomplished as promptly and as efficiently, even at increased cost, as by the agencies. The pensioners themselves are unanimous and earnest in their protest against such a plan. Their experience with the Bureau of Pensions, involving to their mind unnecessary delays and correspondence in prosecuting claims, etc., during a period of forty years, causes them strongly to dissent to such proposed change.

3. The Secretary asserts that "no inconvenience" would result from the proposed plan of paying all pensioners from the Bureau, or by one disbursing officer, instead of by agents, as now.

OBJECTIONS.

(a) Again he promises no improvement.

(b) While it is true that a portion of the pensioners are paid by agencies remote from their places of residence, as by the San Francisco agency referred to by the Secretary, yet the number being so paid is relatively small. The total number residing in Montana, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, paid at San Francisco, as referred to by the Secretary, is only 14,418, not as many as reside in single cities where some agencies are located. Again, these States are not nearly so remote from San Francisco as they are from Washington, D. C. The Secretary calls attention to the fact that 10,000 pensioners living in the San Francisco agency district are paid at other agencies. The San Francisco agency district embraces nearly one-third of the whole area of the United States, viz: California, Nevada, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Washington, Wyoming, Utah, and Arizona; and in addition, pensioners in Alaska, the Philippines, Hawaii, and other insular possessions in the Pacific Ocean are paid at this agency. So that these 10,000 pensioners, scattered throughout such a vast territory, are almost insignificant. And it may be observed that one reason for their continuing to draw from other agencies than San Francisco is because they are, in many instances, nearer some other agency; as, for instance, Topeka or Des Moines; and another reason is because, in order to be transferred to the San Francisco agency, it is necessary to conduct correspondence with the Bureau at Washington, make affidavit, etc., involving expenditure of time and money. Many of those living in California and paid by other agencies than San Francisco, are only temporary residents there, seeking restoration to health, etc.

4. The Secretary proceeds to set forth other considerations bearing upon and in support of the proposed abolishment of agencies. He enumerates as follows:

1. That a large amount of correspondence between the Bureau and the agencies would be saved.

2. That the printing of all vouchers for one disbursing officer, instead of for eighteen, would save expense.

3. That there is always danger of losing pension agents' accounts in transmission by mail.

4. That the work done by eighteen designated clerks can be done by six or eight clerks in the Bureau.

5. There is now a duplication of records involving unnecessary expense.

OBJECTIONS.

1. (a) The amount of correspondence between the Bureau and the agencies would be more than offset by the increased correspondence between the pensioners and the Bureau. Hundreds of personal inquiries are made monthly at pension agencies resulting in increased satisfaction to the pensioners and decreased expenditure of time on the part of clerks. One clerk can hear and answer a hundred inquiries personally made who could not read and answer twenty-five inquiries by mail in the same length of time.

(b) It is well known that the methods of conducting correspondence by the Bureau with pensioners are not as prompt or as economical as the methods in vogue at agencies.

2. The vouchers may now, and it is likely will be, printed uniformly without the pension agents' name or agency. Even if they are not, the cost is infinitesimal.

3. (a) Provision against loss of accounts in transmission by mail is made by registering all official mail matter, in conformity with the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury rendered April 17, 1906, of which provision and precaution the pension agent whose vouchers were lost evidently did not take advantage.

(b) The possibility of such loss is so remote as to be hardly worthy of serious consideration.

(c) Accounts may be settled, as in this case they are to be, from other records in the agency.

4. The signing of pension agents' checks, now done by eighteen designated clerks, does not require the entire time of said clerks. They render other valuable clerical service in the agencies. No saving could be accomplished by a change here.

5. The Division in the Pension Bureau, or the one disbursing officer paying pensions, would certainly require official records (1) authorizing payments; (2) of payments made; and (3) of transmission of accounts to the auditor's office. The records would be practically the same as those now in use in the agencies.

In view of the foregoing facts, figures, and other considerations, it would appear that while the honorable Secretary of the Interior asserts that the adoption of his proposed plan of paying all pensioners from Washington would result in a more economical administration of the laws relating to the payment of pensions without involving any undesirable features, he has, nevertheless, failed to prove his contention; whereas, on the other hand and contrary to the Secretary's claim, such proposed change would inevitably result in greatly increased cost to the Government and in inconvenience and peculiar hardship to the large body of pensioners.

Finally, the system now in vogue is excellent. It is entirely satisfactory to the pensioners, and is conducted at a minimum cost to the Government; while the suggestions of the honorable Secretary of the Interior fail to promise improved efficiency or to prove reduction of expenses.

I have the honor to be,

Your most obedient servant,

ST. CLAIR A. MULHOLLAND,
United States Pension Agent, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour's time, or such part thereof as he may desire, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO].

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, we have been discussing in committees of this House during this session the question as to whether any amendment is needed to the currency laws of this country, and, if any amendment is needed, what amendment ought to be made. It is now over forty years that the present system of currency has existed in this country. So far there has been no question as to the validity of any currency issued—no question as to any national-bank note being good. And yet, during all this time there has hardly been a year but the deficiencies of our currency system have been felt by the whole country. Every year whenever the crops are to be moved there has not been sufficient currency for that purpose in the South or in the West, and yet during all that time, so difficult is it to make any change in the currency system of the country, practically nothing has been done. At this time, although we might talk about it, we probably should do nothing, except for the tremendous financial disaster and panic that this country passed through last fall, largely, as is believed by all financial students, on account of the deficiencies of our currency system.

A large number of measures have been introduced into this House. The last time I investigated I think there were eighty-one measures in the House and in the Senate. Those measures are divided up into fifty-six House bills and twenty-five Senate bills. Of these, twenty-five are for the insurance of deposits; nine are for credit currency; fifteen are for emergency or bond-secured currency; three are for emergency cotton-secured currency; one is for a central-bank system; one is for a sovereign trust company; one provides for the issuance of two billion of United States bond notes; one provides that all United States bonds shall be legal tender; two provide that the national banks may loan upon real estate mortgages; one provides that all reserves shall be kept in the vault of the bank to which they belong; one provides for clearing-house districts, and there are twenty-one miscellaneous bills of various kinds.

There are perhaps only four of these measures that have had any serious consideration. The Senate bill, known as the "Aldrich bill," the "Fowler bill" here in the House, the bill which was introduced by Senator HOPKINS in the Senate and by Mr. MCKINNEY in the House—being the bill that was drawn, I think, by the Bankers' Association, practically the same bill that was introduced last year—and the bill that was introduced by Senator PLATT that provides for clearing-house districts; and I ought perhaps to mention the single bill that provides that all reserves of the banks must be kept in the banks to which they belong. These are, to my mind, the only measures that have received or can receive serious consideration from this House. Of course there are many people who believe, including the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], that a central banking system is the only system which can be successful in the best way. But there has been so general, and is now so general, objection to any central system, any central bank, that will put the whole interests of the country not only under one control, but, if a central banking system is to be successful, as in other countries, it must be under Government control, that that system can not, I think, in the present temper of this House and the people of the country, be successful or be adopted. The clearing-house system of notes is the one, if not adopted into law, that will be used in case of emergency if we do not do something better. It is the system that this country had to adopt in the late stress. In all the great cities the clearing-house system is what saved the country from the greatest financial disaster we have ever had and perhaps that the world has ever seen.

The great trouble about our present system, especially in a question of the currency, is that there is no agreement or coordination in the banking system of this country, except in a few of the large cities where there are clearing houses. Every bank is for itself. It has no care for the welfare of its neighbor, and until some general system is provided by which all the banks are bound together and all must take care of each we shall always have financial troubles. So that I say that the bill introduced here for clearing-house districts is the one that this country will certainly work under in case of a new emergency if we fail to pass some kind of legislation here this winter.

The two measures that are receiving the most serious consideration are, first, the Aldrich bill, providing for an emergency currency only; not intended, so far as I can hear or ascertain from anything that is said or from the bill itself, not intended to meet the continuous wants of the country; not intended to meet the annual demands for currency to move the crops, but merely to meet some such emergency as we had this last fall. It provides, or did provide, for the issuance of not exceeding $500,000,000 of currency, to be secured by State, county, and municipal bonds to 90 per cent of the market value of those bonds, and railroad bonds to 75 per cent of their value, the same to be deposited in the United States Treasury, and then provided for a graduated tax on the currency, secured by United States bonds, where the bonds did not draw more than 2 per cent, one quarter of 1 per cent half yearly; on currency secured by any other United States bonds, one-half of 1 per cent half yearly; on all other, one-half of 1 per cent per month, or 6 per cent per annum.

It is claimed that with a tax of this kind none of this emergency currency would be taken out except in time of panic or in time of great need by some railroad or some municipality when they are willing to pay at least 6 per cent interest, and they would have to pay more than that in order to induce any bank to take it out. So that either this measure is a bank-panic currency or is merely a scheme to sell railroad, city, county, and municipal bonds. It can only be useful in these two cases.

It seems to me that this measure is practically of no use to meet the purposes of the country. Every spring and summer there is accumulated in the great cities, largely in the city of New York, upward of $400,000,000, mostly the reserves of the Western, Southern, and country banks. Now, as long as these reserves remain in the banks that own them, not one hundred of that $400,000,000 can be loaned. It must be kept in gold or some other form of reserve, legal tender; but the moment that it goes into the reserve city, to New York, for example, all but 25 per cent of it can be loaned. I think that is so in all the great reserve cities; 75 per cent can be loaned the moment that it is deposited with the reserve bank.

Then in the fall, when these country banks need the money to move the crops, they send to New York to get the reserve money that they have sent there. New York has loaned out 75 per cent of this. It has to loan it out because it pays 2 per cent on the $400,000,000, and when the Western banks want the money the $400,000,000 has disappeared, either in loans on stocks and bonds or all kinds of enterprises in any part of the world where money can be loaned. And instead of the banks having for their use $400,000,000 of reserve money, there remains only $100,000,000, and if times are at all hard, the New York banks find it impossible to secure the money, and they must in any event call in four times as many loans as they have made on this reserve, at once causing what approaches a panic in New York City, Chicago, and more or less in St. Louis every year, as a result of this annual movement of the crops and other products of industry from the interior to the seaboard. Now, it seems to me there ought to be something done at this time to meet that difficulty.

The Aldrich bill does not pretend to meet any such difficulty. That bill is founded really upon a bill that was drawn by a savings bank man in Pittsburg. He sent that bill all over the United States, to almost every financial man, and while this was somewhat modified and perhaps polished up by a lawyer before it appeared in the Senate, yet in substance the Aldrich bill is the same thing as this Pittsburg man recommended to the whole country, and was intended by him not to meet the difficulties of this situation, but to make it so that savings banks and trust companies and State banks could take the State, municipal, and county bonds that they held as securities to Washington and trade them for currency to meet the demands of their customers in time of panic. That was the purpose of this bill, and, aside from furnishing a sale for railroad and municipal bonds, that is the only purpose that it can serve. It has in it no annual automatic increase and decrease of currency as the country demands it. There is only one system that this country has ever seen or that the world has ever seen that can meet the condition which occurs yearly, and many times a year in different places, the system for changing the credits of the banks into currency for the use of their customers. The credits of the banks to-day are about $13,000,000,000. All the currency of the United States, paper, gold coin, and everything, amounts, roughly speaking, to about $3,000,000,000. Of that about $1,000,000,000 is stored in the vaults of the United States Treasury, where it can not be used, and about $1,000,000,000 is in the pockets of the public, serving as pocket money, and about that amount stays in the pockets of the public. So that leaves actually only about $1,000,000,000 to meet the demands of $13,000,000,000 of credits, and until some means are provided by which the banks can turn some of this $13,000,000,000 of credit on their books into bank notes to meet the demands of their customers there must be trouble every year and in every locality whenever an extraordinary demand arises. In the cities where there are large manufactories and when the pay rolls are enormous there is practically a currency stringency, at times almost amounting to a panic, every time the pay rolls are made up. They must send all over the country to gather up enough currency to meet that demand, and yet within a week or two that money is all back in the banks and distributed over the country again.

When the panic arrived last fall the people came to their banks, came to the New York banks, to banks which were in the soundest condition, to get currency. Many of them who were not poor people and did not need the money to live on from day to day attempted to secure money, because they knew if they did not get it then they could not get it until the panic was over. But there was not any currency to be had. The New York banks alone needed more currency than this whole country contained, and there was no means by which they could get it. The only way by which they saved themselves from absolute bankruptcy was by the clearing-house banks getting together and issuing clearing-house certificates to meet this trouble.

In Pittsburg they had to go further. They were unable to get currency enough to pay their workmen, and they issued one and two dollar clearing-house certificates. They did that without any legal authority to issue it as money. They did it from the necessities of the case. It seems to me that there ought to be some legal means by which the banks could meet this difficulty. That is not because we care anything about the banks in this House, except as the instrument of attending to the business of the country and to make the exchanges of the country. It is because it is for the interest of the whole people that there should be some instrument by which the people can, when they desire, change the credit they have on the banks for currency that they can ship or use elsewhere; that there should be some instrument by which they can do it. There is none to-day; as soon as there is a demand for currency there is no currency; it does not exist.

The bill introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] attempts to meet this difficulty, and extraordinary as it may seem, it meets here with the objection that it is something new; that it is going to make some great change in the financial system. It is true it does make a great change in our financial system, but it is not new and it is not untried in this country. The only banks we had prior to the civil war that were absolutely sound and were meeting the demands of their localities in the country were the banks that were based upon exactly this system, for example, the banks of Indiana, Illinois, Louisiana, and the banks of New England. If I recollect, the old bank in Goshen, N. Y., used to issue what was called a gold note that was at a premium anywhere in the United States, because it was redeemable in gold, a pure credit note issued against the credit of the bank.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. WALDO. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Did the bank at Goshen maintain a gold reserve sufficient to redeem the notes, or was it purely a question of public confidence?

Mr. WALDO. The best answer I can give the gentleman is that they always did redeem them; they always kept a sufficient reserve on hand so that there was never a demand for the payment of a Goshen note that it was not met.

Mr. GOULDEN. Why is it, if the gentleman can tell us, that we only see the necessity for more currency in the years in which the panics exist? Once every seven or ten years this shortage of currency seems to affect the country. Why is it that all these other years we are able to supply from the New York banks all the country banks want; what is the trouble?

Mr. WALDO. I think the question contains a false premise. I believe we have a currency scarcity every year in New York. It has occurred every year in my recollection. There has never been a fall when there was not a scarcity of currency in New York City, with the result that many commercial operations were stopped because the banks could not meet them. They were obliged to call in loans when they ought to be extending them, but they were obliged to call them in in order to meet the demands for currency of the Western and Southern correspondents.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to say, and I think other business men will join with me, that we have never noticed it. It may be among the professional men, but, as a business man, I have never noticed that conditions of affairs in the city of New York in the twenty years that I have resided there, except in times of financial depression.

Mr. WALDO. I will say that this stringency, which amounts to a panic, does not arise every fall by any means; it is only a stringency that shows a deficiency in our currency system. I do not think there is a banker that I have talked with who has correspondents outside of the city, that will not say that that is so in the fall of every year.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think it is largely the lack of confidence, and as we are doing business not upon a currency but upon the confidence of the public, does not the gentleman imagine that the credit system, the loans, checks, and drafts which become the people's currency, lacks that public confidence, and then the currency trouble occurs?

Mr. WALDO. I think that is not entirely so. Of course the checks and drafts system of the country takes the place of currency. It does it all the time. We could not do business without these checks and drafts. But notwithstanding that, every fall when New York City has to gather together from three to four hundred millions of dollars in currency, the banks of New York have to call in perhaps a billion dollars of loans in order to get that money to send to the South and West.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALDO. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. I would like to state that as a business man I was engaged for a great many years in the iron and steel business, and that I have personal knowledge that this currency shortage occurs every fall without any reference to whether there are panic conditions or not. Men who are engaged in the iron business, which is the business barometer of the country, find it difficult to get the money necessary to carry on their operations during the latter months of the season, because of this shortage of currency. I wish also, if the gentleman will permit me, to ask him if he does not believe that he has erroneously included the banks of Illinois before the war in the same class with the system in New England and the banks of Indiana and Louisiana?

Mr. WALDO. No; I think not. There was one bank, if I remember——

Mr. HAYES. Perhaps one bank; but the banking system of Illinois was a bond system, and its currency was nearly always at a heavy discount.

Mr. WALDO. I understand that. I do not mean the whole banking system, but I mean one principal bank in that State. I do not remember the name.

Mr. HAYES. It was run by a Scotchman by the name of Smith.

Mr. WALDO. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to interrupt the gentleman for a moment. I want to say that as a business man and a banker, having been associated with my brother Representative, that in all my business dealings in the city of New York I have never met a stringency of currency if my credit was good, and I have been a business man in the city of New York for thirty-five years and I have employed from 1 to 1,000 men. [Applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. I will say that when I alluded to other business men I alluded particularly to my colleague, Mr. McMILLAN.

Mr. WALDO. I will say, in regard to that, that my colleague from New York may never have met that stringency himself because he has been able to make arrangements to meet the demands upon him, and I have no doubt that he has.

Mr. GOULDEN. His credit was good.

Mr. WALDO. His credit was good, but that does not meet the main trouble that is existing continuously, not only in New York but in the money centers in this country—the necessity of obtaining a large amount of currency every fall to move the crops.

Mr. HAYES. And move other things also.

Mr. WALDO. And move other things that have to be moved at that time. I think there is not a civilized country in the world that has not a credit system or some branch of a credit system, except the United States. Some of them have been in existence for many years. Even our little neighbor up here, Canada, has a credit system, and a gentleman of our committee, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS], informed the committee that whenever there was a shortage of currency, as there was often in his part of Maine, they secured all the credit money they needed from Canada, and it circulated like United States money through that portion of Maine near Canada. He was asked what became of it, and he said that as soon as they got through using it it went right back to the banks in Canada where it came from.

Mr. HAYES. And was redeemed?

Mr. WALDO. Was redeemed at once; that they never lost a dollar; that it never was any different, so far as value was concerned, in the readiness with which the people in that locality took it, from United States Treasury or gold notes or gold. It came out of the banks of Canada, not only when the demand was made for it by Canadians who lived in that vicinity, but whenever the neighboring Americans were short they went to these little Canadian banks and obtained all the money they wanted, paid their bills, and it went back again just as soon as use of it was through.

That is the history of the credit currency in this country. It is the history of it in Europe. If I recollect right the bank of Louisiana, which had a credit currency, not only withstood all the troubles for many years before the war, but never suspended specie payments, even during the war, and only suspended when the Union Army captured the city and compelled the bank to either go out of business or come under the national banking system. The Bank of France went through substantially the same experience when Paris was captured by the Germans. It went through wars before that—through revolutions. There never was a time when it was not ready to meet the demands of the country, and in such a time as this—that is, last fall—when our banks instead of extending their loans were contracting them, in a most desperate attempt to meet the demands for currency, the Bank of France, instead of doing that, made loans to merchants whose credit was good and whose business was in good shape; and that is what we ought to have been doing and what we could have done if we had a credit system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that goes only to the system of currency. There can not be any reason why such a system of currency would not be as good as the present system. It would have behind it a gold reserve in the largest cities of 25 per cent, and it would be secured by a fund in the hands of the United States Government of over $700,000,000—many, many times the amount necessary to make good any losses that could possibly occur, according to the history of our country.

Then there is another trouble with our present system, aside from its inelasticity, and that is that it can not be obtained when it is wanted; it takes so long a time that the trouble is over before you can get it. We have never had any trouble so far to keep our bond-secured currency on a par with the lawful money of the country, because the country has been, as a general thing, in a prosperous condition, but we would not go through any protracted war before our United States bonds would fall off 15, 20, or, perhaps, 30 per cent. As a result of the Boer war the English consols fell off 26 per cent. If we had a war of any length of time with any country our bonds would certainly be at a discount of 20 to 30 per cent. Then where would the security for our currency be? It would be gone. Now, that is one objection. Another, and a more serious objection, is this, and which people generally can not seem to understand: The assets of the bank ought to be liquid. They ought to be either in the shape of reserves of the bank or in the perfectly good notes of the merchants—the business people of the locality.

The immediate result of this bond-secured system is something like this: Take a bank of $100,000 capital. It takes $100,000 of money and it goes to the Treasury here and has to pay in the $100,000 in reserve money, or what is equal to it, and it gets back not reserves, not money on which loans can be founded, which will be reserves against its depositors, but it gets back its own notes, no better than its own draft in principle, for it has deposited its own money in the hands of the United States Government, or what the money purchased, namely, the bonds. So the immediate result is that when it goes away, when it leaves New York or whatever other town the officers go from with this $100,000 of reserve money, and which, if it had been kept in the bank, would have enabled it to loan, according to the usual rule, $400,000, because that would be ample to meet $400,000 of loans, they must reduce their loans in consequence $400,000. The moment they deposit that in Washington they can not loan a dollar, not one single dollar, until they get reserves from some other place. Notwithstanding that they have $100,000 of their notes, of their own national-bank notes, they are not reserves, and they can not loan one dollar. The first thing they must do, if they want to loan that $100,000 when they get home to their bank, is to find somewhere $25,000 in gold or its equivalent. So that the very force and power, the very purpose of that bank, as an instrument of accommodation to the people of the locality, is gone just the moment it obtains that currency. It must do something else before it can accommodate any man. It can not pay a dollar of its currency out until it has a reserve against it. So the people who have to put up the $100,000 must put up a surplus the next thing. Unless the reserve comes in as a deposit, they must put up a reserve themselves before they can use a single dollar of their own notes. Now, that is the main trouble with this system, that it puts a large percentage of the bank assets in the country now, about $700,000,000, into a long-term bond, where it is absolutely of no use to the commerce of the country, and when it ought to be in the banks for the use of the business men. It ought to be there, where it could be used for loans to accommodate the people of this country, and that $700,000,000 means four times, at least—anyway, it means that in New York City—four times as much, or two billion eight hundred million, here contracted by means of a bond-secured system. And the Aldrich, or the Thiers bill, as I call it, preferably, because that is what it is, does not attempt in any way to aid in that difficulty. On the contrary, it calls upon the banks of the country to look around and find more reserves, to part with the very reserves they have, in order to buy these bonds, and makes them that much worse off than they were before.

Now, there are other provisions in the bill reported by the House Committee on Banking and Currency that I believe are admirable features, but many of them are not necessary to the adoption of the credit system of currency, although they would be of great aid and ought to be adopted, in my opinion. There is no more reason why a bank should not be permitted to issue its note, provided it is currency that would be good in any part of the country, than there is that it should take the money and give a man credit on its books. They are absolutely the same in principle. One is simply a credit on the books and the other is a credit payable to bearer. That is all the difference. There is no reason why any bank should not issue its credit in one form as well as another, why it should not issue its note as well as its draft, provided it is guaranteed through some system of coordination, either by the banks themselves or by a deposit with the Government.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALDO. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I should be very much interested, and I have no doubt that the committee would be, to know just wherein the Fowler bill is strong and wherein it is weak, what are its weaknesses and what its strength, if you can tell us briefly. I would like to hear that, because I believe the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and therefore familiar with it. He can omit the weak points if he likes and tell us the strong ones.

Mr. WALDO. I would say, in answer to the gentleman's question, that I do not admit that there are any weak points in it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then give us the strong points, please.

Mr. WALDO. The strong points of the Fowler bill are, first, that it permits the banks to retain their assets in their vaults for the use of the country and does not compel them to tie them up in long-term bonds, where they contract the loans that ought to be made to the merchants of the country, between two and three billion dollars. That is the first result of this system, and it is one of the most serious results. In the first place, it would make it possible for the banks to furnish at less cost currency for the use of the country at the time when a large amount of currency is needed—in the fall and summer. In the next place, it would permit them to guarantee the deposits, for if there is anything in the note being guaranteed, there is no reason why the deposit on the books should not be. The bank pays for the guaranty; nobody loses by this provision of the bill; the whole thing will be comparatively light on the banks. It will raise some $700,000,000, all of which is reserved, and in case of liquidation goes back to the banks, less any charges that may be made against the fund.

But another, and one of the most beneficial provisions in this bill, is the provision in regard to what might be called the clearing-house districts. They are called bank-note redemption districts, but they are really clearing-house districts. The country is to be divided into twenty districts, I think, in the bill as amended now. It is under the control of the Comptroller of the Currency to decide where the centers of these districts for the redemption of the notes shall be. Now, each one of these districts has a board of managers of its own. It is their business to investigate the condition of the banks in their district four times a year at least, and as much oftener as they see fit. That does not interfere with the examination of the banks by the Comptroller of the Currency whenever he deems it necessary. Each one of these districts must pay, in case of failure, one-fourth of any loss that accrues by reason of any loss of any bank of the district. So that instead of being a bank examiner or a board of examiners, that have no interest except so far as it may affect their personal standing in the examinations of these banks, they are a board of examiners, a board of managers, whose institutions must pay one-fourth of any loss that accrues through the failure of any bank to take care of its obligations. Now, the result of that would be, it seems to me, that no failures would occur, because the moment any bank got into trouble by the directors making loans that they ought not to, or otherwise by extravagant or foolish loans or investments, this board of managers have power to close them up and put in one of the members as a receiver.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would like to ask my colleague a question. Would not that be a step toward a bank trust?

Mr. WALDO. I think not.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it is.

Mr. WALDO. On the contrary, it would prevent that very thing. I think it would prevent the linking together of a whole string of banks, as done under our present system. It would be under a board of managers. There would be no more liability of the linking of these banks, not so much as under the present clearing-house system.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think that there would have to be twenty trusts formed in that event? Would there not be a division of power so far as a trust is concerned instead of a concentration of power?

Mr. WALDO. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will not the gentleman tell the committee what the Fowler bill allows or permits as security to be used for a credit currency? What are the classes of security permitted under its provisions?

Mr. WALDO. There is no security for the credit currency. The credit currency is the same as the draft of the bank, except that it is issued by the United States Government, and is guaranteed by a fund raised on all the banks; and under the present bill it is estimated to be a fund of about $700,000,000. That would guarantee the notes. It will also guarantee the credits or deposits.

Mr. HAYES. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement he has just made, saying that the currency would be issued by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WALDO. That is incorrect. All that I meant is that it will be printed by the United States, so that it may all be in the same or practically in the same form as national-bank notes to-day, but it goes to the banks and is issued by them.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is a distinguished member of the Committee on Banking and Currency; can he tell us how much of the proposed money can be securely and safely issued under the Fowler bill? Does he think it can be issued without limitation and always have it safe and secure?

Mr. WALDO. Suppose that the gentleman is running a bank himself, that his capital is $100,000, and that his deposits are $1,000,000. Now, it is necessary for him to pay off $100,000 in a time of trouble.

Mr. GOULDEN. At any time?

Mr. WALDO. In time of trouble, because that is the time we can not get it. You want the money. You can not get it from the banks, because they all need it. Under our present system they need it themselves. Under a credit system you would be authorized to pay out these notes. Under the bill originally, I believe you can only issue credit currency to the amount of your capital. The Aldrich bill provided for the issuance of emergency currency, including the bond-secured currency, capital and surplus, but the Fowler bill provides for its issuance only to the amount of its capital, except upon application to the board of managers, when you can issue whatever the board of managers think it safe for you to issue.

Mr. HAYES. Up to a certain limit.

Mr. WALDO. Yes; up to double the amount of the capital.

Originally I think there was no limit. In that case you would have your notes in your vaults, and when the demand came in for $100,000 you could issue that amount. Under the present system, in time of panic, you would have to buy it at 5 or 10 per cent, and like enough could not even get it at that. There were times when it could not be obtained even at that price. But that money would merely represent $100,000 in your book accounts. You owed it just as much before, and if you were an honest and safe banker it would be just as safe in one form as it was in another. If, on the contrary, there was any trouble with your bank, there would be $700,000,000 in the hands of the United States to guarantee that it would be good, and all the banks of your district would guarantee one-fourth of that before any draft could be made upon the amount in the hands of the Government.

Now, there is one thing more that I intended to say before closing. There has been some suggestion that this might lead to recklessness in the banking business; that the directors would not be as careful as to loans that they made or in their investments, but it seems to me that this guaranty of the notes would have no such effect, and the guaranty of the deposits could have no such effect, because the people who are interested in the bank as a bank are the stockholders and the officers. And before one dollar can be taken from the guaranty fund or from the district the bank is totally wiped out. In other words, the stockholders must lose all their stock. They must also, under the law, lose as much more as the value of their stock, and the officers would be practically ruined in business and reputation before any attack could be made upon the guaranty fund, so that the bank would be practically in the same condition that it is now. That is the only thing that keeps a bank conservative and keeps it safe—the fact that the men who own the capital, and the officers, have their interest in the business of the bank, in its stock, and in its reputation, which in the case of many of our most successful bankers is practically all they have, because many of them are not wealthy men. The stockholders must lose all their interest in the banks and must pay up as much more, so that the same inducement to honesty, conservatism, and proper banking would exist under the Fowler bill as under the present law, it seems to me.

After all, while that is one of the important things, the most important thing for us to do to-day is to adopt some credit currency. It does not make so much difference in what particular form or under what particular bill it is if some measure of relief is afforded to the banking interests of this country and the people of this country by which they may obtain in currency when they need it the credits that are now on the bank books; that will obviate the real trouble in our banking system, aside from the other question. Those two things, however, must be in some way taken care of. We must have some legislation first that will allow a bank to issue its notes in place of the national-bank notes and still retain its cash in its vaults for the foundation of loans and for a reserve against deposits, and yet issue its notes against the credits that have come to it. Then, secondly, we must make some provision by which the banks are to be bound together in association and make all look after the honesty and conservatism and safety of each one.

Until those two things are done we are going to have trouble every fall, and whenever a financial crisis arises we are going to have a panic; and unless the banks get together at those times, as they did this last fall, and form clearing-house associations, and take care of the business of the country in practically the way that the Fowler bill provides that it shall be taken care of all over the country, by these districts, we are going to have serious trouble whenever times of depression come. And I trust that this House at least will not be frightened by any talk of the danger of change. It is not proposed to try any new thing. It is proposed to adopt a system of credit currency that has been successful and the only system that has been really successful in this country in its history; the only system that is successful or that obtains in the civilized world outside of this country, a system that has been tried hundreds of years, and whose workings are known just as absolutely as they will be after we have tried the system a hundred years, with the same benefits and the same success, I believe, that it has been tried in other countries.

Nothing can be done toward changing our currency system, to my mind, except following some such financial disaster as we have just passed through, and if we conclude to adopt the Aldrich bill, or some such measure, which does not attempt to change from a bond-secured currency to a credit currency, the same inertia that has obtained in this country ever since the adoption of the bond-secured system will continue until we meet another and perhaps a worse disaster. It seems to me that now is the time to act. We look over the history of the currency systems of the world and our country, and we find here offered one that has been successful, and the only one that has ever been successful in the history of the world. We recognize the dangers that we have just passed through, and barely escaped the worst financial disaster this country has ever known. Now we have an opportunity when the people are interested in it, when they feel the necessity of having something done. Now is the time when we can do something that will really change our system and put it on a proper basis, and unless we do it now it will rest until the next time we are in need.

I trust, gentlemen, that we may have the courage to look at this matter squarely, to try to understand it, and to see that we have nothing new before us—that we have offered in the Fowler bill the only successful currency system—and let us go ahead on that line and try to establish in this country, as there is already established in all civilized countries except this, a currency system that will be a benefit to all of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. I now yield, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, there are few subects of public discussion about which there is more unjust criticism—I might, without exaggeration, say, unjust abuse—than the rules of the National House of Representatives. The criticism and abuse come largely from Members of the House when in the minority, and from newspapers and magazine writers, and some others of whom, without unfairness, it may be said that they have very little knowledge or intelligent conception of what they are writing or talking about. Indeed, I think it may be truly said that there are comparatively few Members of the House itself, much less outsiders, who have any real knowledge of the rules. The rules are simple enough and entirely logical, but to the majority of Members of the House who have no special ambition to familiarize themselves with them they seem complicated.

There is nothing new in this protest against the rules. It is human nature to be uneasy under restraint, and in all Congresses, even among the first, when the membership was small and the rules were simple, complaint was heard as now from those who could not have their own way.

The rules of the National House of Representatives are not the conception of any one man or set of men; they are not the product of any one Congress or of any combination of Congresses; they are an evolution, the outgrowth of the parliamentary experience, necessities and exigencies of all the hundred years and more of our Congressional life. The book of rules contains no rule that had not a reasonable necessity for its adoption in the first instance and has not a like necessity for its continuance now. As a whole the rules are so made as to render possible the most expeditious accomplishment in the wisest way of the legislative business of our ninety millions of American people.

An impartial examination of them will show that the power of recognition popularly attributed to the Speaker as autocratic is grossly exaggerated; that that power, in point of fact, so far as the rules are concerned, is limited; and that the apparent restrictions upon individual initiative, so far as they exist at all, are due not to the rules, but to the character of the House as now constituted, and to the exigencies of the public business.

A brief review of the history of the rules will serve to demonstrate the truth of this statement.

There have been two revisions of the rules within the last thirty years.

In the Forty-sixth Congress (1880) the rules were revised under the direction of the Committee on Rules, consisting of Speaker Randall and Messrs. Stephens, Blackburn, Garfield, and Frye. The changes then made consisted mainly in dropping a number of rules that, by reason of changed conditions had become obsolete, in consolidating a number of others and changing their arrangement, and in the introduction of a very few new rules. The Committee in its report, which was unanimous, said:

> The objective point with the committee was to secure accuracy in business, economy of time, order, uniformity, and impartiality, and to prepare, if possible, a simple, concise, and nonpartisan code of rules, which would neither surrender the right of a majority to control and dispose of the business for which it is held responsible, nor, on the other hand, invade and restrict the powers of a minority to check temporarily, if not permanently, the action of a majority believed to be improper or unconstitutional, and to attain, if possible, the great underlying principle of all the rules and forms by which the business of a legislative assembly is governed, whether constitutional, legal, or parliamentary in their origin, viz, "to subserve the will of the assembly rather than to restrain it, to facilitate and not to obstruct the expression of its deliberate sense."

The rules then adopted remained in force until the Fifty-first Congress (1890), when they were revised by the Committee on Rules, consisting of Speaker Thomas B. Reed, Messrs. McKinley, CANNON, Carlisle, and Randall. By this revision, out of the total number of forty-seven rules, twenty-nine were allowed to remain unchanged, and in the remaining eighteen such changes as were made were only formal, except in four fundamental particulars. These related to (1) dilatory motions, (2) the counting of a quorum, (3) the number which should constitute a quorum in Committee of the Whole, and (4) the order of business. This last revision was found necessary in order to carry out the announced objects sought to be attained by the revision of 1880, viz, "Economy of time, order, and the right of a majority to control and dispose of the business for which it is held responsible."

Prior to this last revision, under then existing rules, the practice known as filibustering had grown to such an extent as to waste much valuable time and to threaten the power of the majority to deal with the business of the country. By the use of the privileged motions "to adjourn to a day certain," and "to take a recess," and the practice on the part of Members of remaining silent and refusing to vote, thus breaking a quorum, it was in the power of the minority at any time effectually to obstruct the passage of any legislation. A motion to adjourn to a day certain was subject to two amendments, on each of which, as well as on the original motion, the yeas and nays could be ordered. The same was true as to the motion to take a recess; these motions could be repeated without limit, and thus days could be consumed in useless calls of the roll. In point of fact, in the Fiftieth Congress on one occasion the House remained in continuous session eight days and nights, during which time there were over one hundred roll calls on the iterated and reiterated motions to adjourn and to take a recess and their amendments. On this occasion the reading clerks became so exhausted that they could no longer act, and certain Members, possessed of large voices and strenuous lungs, took their places. If this was not child's play it would be difficult to define it. Then, again, when a measure to which the minority objected was likely to pass, the yeas and nays would be ordered.

The objecting minority Members, sitting in their seats, would fail to respond when their names were called, and when the count was made it would appear that there was no quorum present to do business, and thus the measure would fail. It seems now strange to realize that many eminent men acting as Speakers of the House maintained that for this manifest evil no remedy existed. It remained for the Speaker of the Fifty-first Congress, Thomas B. Reed, the greatest parliamentary leader in the history of English-speaking people, to make an end of this manifest absurdity. He declared that physical presence and constructive absence was impossible; that the quorum called for by the Constitution was a present and not a voting quorum; and so, on a certain historic occasion, he added to the names of those voting the names of those present and not voting and announced the result accordingly. He has no greater glory than that the principle he announced and put into practice has not only been indorsed by the Supreme Court of the United States, but also by his partisan foes when they came into power in the House, and by the practical results which recent years of wise legislation unobstructed by foolish tactics have put on the statute book. Under present rules the motion to adjourn to a day certain and the motion to take a recess are not privileged, and, furthermore, the Speaker is not allowed to entertain any dilatory motion. If a quorum has been ascertained by actual count to be present, a measure voted on passes or fails in accordance with the recorded vote, whether all Members have voted or not.

In the Committee of the Whole 100 now constitutes a quorum instead of a majority of the whole House. This is in the interest of the expedition of business.

Bills are now introduced by filing and not by presentation in the open House, and thus much time is saved. Business once entered upon is continued until concluded instead of, as under prior rules, being limited to a certain time for its consideration and then not having been concluded being sent to the graveyard of the calendar of unfinished business.

In the last Congress (Fifty-ninth) there were 386 Members (in this Congress there are 391), and there were introduced a total of bills and resolutions numbering 27,114. It goes without saying that not all of these bills could be considered, nor could all of these Members have a hearing. Theoretically, every Member of the House is the equal of every other Member; every constituency is entitled to equal recognition with every other constituency, but practically there can not be 391 Speakers; there can not be 391 chairmen of committees, nor equal recognition for debate given to 391 Members. The real purpose, then, to be accomplished by the rules is the selection from the mass of bills introduced those proper to be considered. There is no limitation on the right of a Member to introduce bills; as many as he likes and of whatever character he pleases. Every bill introduced goes to an appropriate committee for consideration, and whether or not it gets upon a House Calendar for action depends upon its being reported by the committee. It may never be reported, and, of course, if not reported can never be considered in the House. In the last Congress, of the 27,114 bills and resolutions introduced, there were 7,839 reported; the others remained in the pigeonholes of the various committees. Of the bills reported, 7,423 were considered and passed. Bills when reported go upon certain calendars of the House, according to the character of the bills.

1. Revenue and appropriation bills. These are few in number, not to exceed, perhaps, 20. They come from the Committee on Ways and Means, whose office it is to provide revenue for the Government, and from the Committee on Appropriations, and from the several committees having to do with the maintenance of the Government in its various arms, such as the Naval Committee, the Military Committee, and others. These bills when reported go to a calendar known as the Union Calendar, but they are highly privileged, as they ought to be, for without their passage the Government wheels would stop. They can be called for consideration at any time. They take precedence of all other bills, and the Speaker has no alternative but to recognize the Member calling them up. These bills are considered not in the House, but in Committee of the Whole; the Speaker leaves the chair and another Member takes his place.

2. Another class of bills are such as relate to some public purpose, but carry no appropriation, such, for instance, as bridge bills and the like. To a large extent bills from the important committees on the Judiciary and on Interstate and Foreign Commerce are of this class. These bills go on the House Calendar and are entitled to consideration in the morning hour. There being no privileged bills for consideration, the morning hour is the regular order. The Speaker must call the committees in their alphabetical order, and then the chairman of the committee which has the call is entitled to recognition by the Speaker, as of right. The House then proceeds to the consideration of such bill reported by the committee in question and then on the House Calendar as the chairman calls up, and continues its consideration until a vote is had, subject only to a possible interruption at the end of sixty minutes, to which I will refer hereafter. But even if interrupted, its consideration is continued thereafter, when business of that character is in order, until it is finally disposed of.

3. In addition to public bills such as I have enumerated, some carrying an appropriation and others not, there is another class of bills, the most numerous of all—private bills providing for the relief of private individuals or corporations. These have a Calendar of their own called the Private Calendar, and are in order on every Friday of each week. They are generally speaking, bills from the Committee on Claims, from the Committee on War Claims, and from the Committee on Pensions. As to these bills the Speaker has no independent right of recognition. When addressed by the chairman of the appropriate committee on a Friday he must recognize him, and unless the House declines to consider these bills the Speaker must leave the chair and nominate a Member to preside in his place. In the last Congress there were reported 6,834 private bills; 6,624 were passed, leaving 210 undisposed of.

There is another class of bills that, like private bills, have a day of their own under the rules, viz, District of Columbia bills. As is well known, there is no right of suffrage in the District of Columbia, and the Senate and House act as its select and common councils. District of Columbia bills are in order on two Mondays of every month. As to these bills, again the Speaker has no alternative but to recognize the chairman of the District Committee when, on his allotted day, he calls up his business.

4. A fourth class of bills provide for various matters of public concern and are such as involve a charge upon the Treasury. These go to the Union Calendar, and when considered must be considered in Committee of the Whole. At the end of the morning hour (sixty minutes) a motion may be made to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar or for the consideration of some particular bill thereon. This motion the Speaker is bound to entertain.

Then, a large part of the business of the House is done wholly outside of the rules, by unanimous consent. Some gentleman, for instance, arises in the House and, being recognized by the Speaker, asks "unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill." Unless objection is made the bill is considered and voted on. It is in connection with this practice and because of it that autocratic power is without any reason ascribed to the Speaker. But the rules have nothing at all to do with this. The applicant for recognition asks that all rules be set aside. To this any Member of the House may object. Why should complaint be made if the Speaker exercises his right of objection by refusing to recognize an applicant for recognition in any particular case? Because he is Speaker he is no less a Member of the House; no less a Representative of his Congressional district. If he were on the floor he could interpose an objection to any request for unanimous consent. Should he be less able to interpose that objection because he is in the chair? Certainly not. That the Speaker's power in this regard is only, in the last analysis, that of a Member may easily be illustrated. During the latter part of the Fifty-fourth Congress, when Mr. Reed was Speaker, there was a Member from Nebraska named Kem who announced that he would object to any consideration of bills by unanimous consent. After the announcement, on the first day, the Speaker's room was crowded, as usual, with applicants for recognition. Mr. Reed promised to do the best he could, but recalled to his applicants Kem's threat to object. Still members persisted, one of them was recognized, and Kem objected. The next day the throng at the Speaker's room was not so great, but still of large proportions. Members had faith that Kem would not persist. Again Mr. Reed promised to do his best; again a recognition was had and again Kem objected. On the third day the Speaker's room was deserted, while an anxious throng surrounded the desk of Mr. Kem, and from that time on, Kem being persistent, the Speaker had peace; Mr. Kem was the autocrat, and the business of the House proceeded under the regular order.

There is no doubt that a great many measures of questionable character are passed by unanimous consent. Members can not keep the run of all bills reported, and are loath to object, both because ignorant of the merits of the particular measure proposed and because they may have measures of their own to be considered and they fear a reciprocity of objection. In a majority of cases the only real intelligent objection made to measures proposed for unanimous consent is that made by the Speaker, who has had opportunity to examine, as was his duty, the bill. On two Mondays in every month and during the last six days of a session a motion is in order to suspend the rules and pass bills, which requires for its adoption a two-thirds vote of a quorum. The object of this rule, of course, is to expedite business by getting rid of bills to which two-thirds of the House are agreed. But the demands for recognition to move to suspend the rules are so far in excess of any possible power of grant upon the Speaker's part that he is confronted by the embarrassing necessity of making a choice. There is no doubt that he performs his unpleasant duty with due regard to his obligation to the public service.

It is manifest that even under the methods provided by the rules for the consideration of all classes of business there must necessarily be measures of great public importance that, by reason of their late report from a committee or for some reason or another, can not be reached in the regular order of business. These are provided for by special orders reported by the Committee on Rules, which consists of the Speaker, two Members from the majority, and two from the minority. Like the rules themselves, the Committee on Rules is made the subject of much unjust criticism. Autocratic power is ascribed to it. But it must be recognized first that the existence of such a body is a necessity, and second that the only power it exercises is the power of the House. The Committee on Rules does not dictate, it simply suggests. Its report is of no consequence until it has been adopted by a majority. The fact that the committee's reports are uniformly adopted, so far from being any evidence of undue authority or power on the part of the committee, is evidence of the discretion of the committee in recognizing and making possible what the House wants to do. The real temper of the House upon any question at any given time, it may be assumed, is better known by the Committee on Rules than by any one else. The committee, so far from being the master, is the servant of the House. Of the 7,423 bills considered last year, only twenty-four were brought forward by the Committee on Rules.

All of these were of large national importance, and consideration of them was in accordance with the well-known desire of a majority of the House, as for instance, among others the following: The statehood bill, the immigration bill, Philippine tariff bill, pure food bill, railroad rate bill, bills relating to Isthmian Canal, and so forth.

While it is true that the authority of the Speaker as to recognition is very much limited, it would be useless to deny that he exercises a great power upon the business of the House. But this is not due to the rules in the first instance, but to the personality of the Speaker himself. Much of his power lies back of his office. It is because of his character, his experience, his service, his position as a party leader that he is Speaker. He comes to his high office because he is primus inter pares. A leader on the floor, he does not cease to be a leader when he becomes Speaker. One who was himself a distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, James G. Blaine, in that most eloquent eulogy pronounced upon his chief, President Garfield, said:

> There is no test of a man's ability in any department of public life more severe than service in the House of Representatives; there is no place where so little deference is paid to reputation previously acquired or to eminence won outside; no place where so little consideration is shown for the feelings or failures of beginners. What a man gains in the House he gains by sheer force of his own character, and, if he loses and falls back, he must expect no mercy, and will receive no sympathy. It is a field in which the survival of the strongest is the recognized rule, and where no pretense can survive and no glamour can mislead. The real man is discovered, his worth is impartially weighed, his rank is irrevocably decided.

Undoubtedly the rules contribute to the Speaker's power in so far as they place in his hands the appointment of committees. He can, by a judicious selection of committee membership, to a limited extent, shape legislation in advance to accord with his views. But, after all, his power in this respect is limited by a number of considerations. In the appointments to committees he must recognize the claims of localities, the qualifications and length of service of his appointees, and various other things. Above all things, he is interested in the success of his administration, in the standing of his party, and in his own reputation for fairness. What he does he does in the open, where all men can see. And, besides, how else could committees be selected in a House of so large a membership as the present House of Representatives? Caucus selection would mean selection by combinations representing localities or special interests; would turn over the power of the House to the States having large delegations. Caucus selection has been tried in the past, and abandoned as impracticable. Committees can best be selected by an authority that can with certainty be located and made to bear the burden of responsibility.

I know of nothing more interesting in the history of Congress than those passages which relate to the expedients to which the majority has been compelled to resort to obtain control as against obstructive tactics upon the part of the minority.

Early in our history unlimited debate was resorted to to prevent legislative action, and the result was the adoption of the previous question in the House. According to Mr. Calhoun it was adopted—> in consequence of the abuse of the right of debate by Mr. Gardenier, of New York, remarkable for his capacity for making long speeches. He could keep the floor for days.

But Mr. Gardenier was only a type, and the adoption of the previous question marks the first step in our Congressional history taken by the majority toward securing its right to rule. The next step was the adoption of the hour rule, pursuant to which a Member of the House is confined to the use of one hour in debate.

It must be confessed that in a House constituted of so large a membership as the House of Representatives unlimited debate would be impossible, having any due regard to the dispatch of the public business. There is little if any complaint about the hour rule. Anyone familiar with the record of the last few Congresses will concede that notwithstanding the existence of the hour rule there has been practically no limitation on the opportunities for debate. All parties desiring to be heard have been furnished an opportunity, and when greater latitude as to time has been asked it has readily been granted by unanimous consent. The House will always listen to the Member who really has something to say.

With each decennial apportionment the House of Representatives increases in numbers. As the numbers increase in the very nature of things the importance of the individual Member decreases and the influence of a few increases. What the remedy for this is I do not undertake to predict, or what new or modified rules may in the future become necessary. But under present conditions the rules of the House of Representatives are as efficient as present wisdom and past experience have been able to devise "to subserve the will of the assembly rather than to restrain it, to facilitate and not to obstruct the expression of its deliberate sense."

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, more than three thousand years ago cotton was found growing in India, and Herodotus tells us that the natives called it "tree wool." He said:

> They made clothes of this tree wool and claimed that it exceeded in beauty and goodness the wool of the sheep.

In 1492 Columbus found cotton growing in the West Indies, and it is certain that cotton came to Jamestown with our fathers in 1607, for it was cultivated that year in Virginia. Pickett, in his history of Alabama, tells us that as early as 1728 cotton flourished in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama.

How to separate the cotton from the seed was an important problem with our fathers, and this tedious task was performed with the fingers. So slow was the process that four pounds of lint per week was as much as a good hand could do. In 1788 there was great rejoicing in the South when a man in Philadelphia invented a machine for separating seed and lint, and this machine could turn out only ten pounds of lint per day.

Not until Ely Whitney, of Georgia, invented the saw gin in 1793 was this feature of the cotton problem solved. The first cotton gin operated by any power other than the hand was run by water in Fairfield, S. C., by James Kincaid, in 1795. For a long time spinning and weaving were done by individuals and families in their homes. They used the little hand carder, the one-thread spinning wheel, and the wooden loom. These were followed by the inventions of Cartwright, Watt, and others, the carding engine, the spinning jenny, and the power loom, all run by steam; and the manufacture of cotton became one of the most important industries in the world.

In 1784 we exported from the United States 8 bales of cotton to England, and this fiber had been separated from the seed by the hand. At Annapolis, Md., in a political convention, 1786, James Madison, of Virginia, the author of the Federal Constitution, said in a speech: "The United States will one day become a great cotton-producing country." [Applause.] We were then producing 5,000 bales.

Mr. Madison's prediction has come true. The South produces 80 per cent of the world's crop of cotton. This cotton belt is 1,450 miles long from east to west and 500 miles wide and has in it 448,000,000 acres. Nowhere in the world are sunshine and shower so mingled and measured out to the cotton plant as is the case in the beautiful South. [Applause.] Charles J. Haden, of Georgia, a splendid authority on the cotton plant, says: "Cotton is a child of climate more than of soil. This plant requires a certain average temperature during the young and tender period—a certain average temperature during the days of its development—and a certain other higher average temperature during the days of its fruition." "Coupled with these conditions," he says, "there must be a certain degree of moisture in the air. The hot winds from the south Atlantic crossing the gulf stream and meeting the colder air currents from the Appalachian chain produce this degree of moisture." "These facts have been proven," he says, "by a century of experiment and scientific research." Climatic conditions make the South the greatest cotton-producing country in the world.

The fact is established that here, and nowhere else in the world, can cotton be grown in abundance, and scientists tell us that the South will remain the great cotton-producing country until the Creator reconstructs the earth. Not only is ours the most favored country in the world for the production of cotton, but it is blessed above all others in ways and means for the manufacture of cotton.

While the first cotton mill in the United States was erected in Massachusetts in 1790, it has been demonstrated that nowhere in all the world can manufacturing be done so cheaply and profitably as in the South. As Phillip said to the eunuch, "Here is much water"—over there is the cotton field and yonder the mountains groan with millions of tons of coal. [Applause.]

In 1880 the amount of capital invested in cotton mills in the South was $21,000,000, and to-day we have invested in this important industry a little over twelve times that amount—$255,000,000.

Twenty-five years ago the South had only 600,000 cotton spindles, and to-day we have about 10,000,000 spindles. In 1890 there were 336 cotton mills in the South, and now we have over 600. Great Britain, or the United Kingdom, is the greatest cotton manufacturing country in the world and has 49,000,000 spindles. America stands next to the mother country with 26,000,000 spindles. Germany comes third with 9,000,000 spindles, Russia is fourth with 7,000,000, and France is fifth with 6,000,000 spindles.

In 1906 New England cotton mills consumed 2,349,478 bales of cotton, and in the same year our southern mills consumed 2,374,225 bales, 25,000 more bales than our northern mills consumed. This is a splendid showing for the South, when you remember that the North has nearly twice as many spindles as we have. There is one fact, however, connected with both that we applaud, and that is that both northern and southern mills consumed more cotton than ever before. We are the greatest cotton-producing people in the world, with the cheapest and best manufacturing facilities on earth. [Applause.]

Cotton mills are increasing rapidly in the South. In 1900 Massachusetts stood first, Rhode Island second, South Carolina third, New Hampshire fourth, North Carolina fifth, Connecticut sixth, Maine seventh, and Georgia eighth. Now, Massachusetts still occupies first place, but South Carolina is second, Rhode Island is third, North Carolina is fourth, Georgia is fifth, New Hampshire is sixth, Connecticut is seventh, and Maine is eighth.

England leads in exporting cotton goods, and Germany is second in the list; the United States is third, and France is fourth. Last year the United States imported more cotton goods than she sold or exported.

England, or the United Kingdom, exports every year more yards of cotton cloth than our American mills produce for both home and outside trade. During the calendar year ending December, 1906, the United Kingdom exported cotton manufactures to the value of $484,000,000, and the United States during the same period exported cotton manufactures to the value of $52,000,000, and yet we exported twice as much as we did in 1904.

In 1906 Great Britain sold China $50,000,000 worth of cotton goods, and we sold her $28,000,000 worth. China is indeed an inviting field. That dim old Empire, with its four hundred millions of people, is the most inviting of all the countries for our cotton trade.

United States Consul Anderson, speaking of our trade with China, said:

> The principal cause for slow development of trade with China is due to the lack of enterprise on our part rather than to anything that has been done or left undone by China. Naturally, China will buy the goods offered for sale in China, other things being equal; and the nation which does not offer an aggressive commercial campaign in its own behalf can not expect the trade.

Roy S. Anderson, who represents the merchants' guild at Sou Chow, China, has been on a visit to the southern cotton mills. Now, cotton reaches Chinese ports only by New York, where a commission is, of course, necessary. From the time it leaves the southern cotton mills and reach the Chinese merchant it is subject to no less than 7 commissions, and one of these as high as 100 per cent. As a consequence, Mr. Anderson says that he has seen common calico sold for 25 cents a yard in Sou Chow, China. By direct trade with our southern mills Chinese merchants can save the cost of 6 of these commissions, and this will enable us to sell calico to China cheaper than any other nation.

Special Agent Hutchinson suggests the sending of competent men to South America. He is enthusiastic over the outlook for a splendid cotton trade there. He says:

> The demand for cotton goods is large and increasing. There is a general awakening in the cotton trade everywhere.

England sold South America in 1906 $18,000,000 worth of cotton goods, while our cotton-goods trade amounted to only $3,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, our export trade in cotton goods has fallen off woefully. Here are some figures that tell the tale.

The total exports of cotton manufactures from the United States to foreign countries for the last three years are as follows:

1905 total exports	$43, 666, 080
1906 total exports	52, 944, 033
1907 total exports	32, 305, 412

In 1905 our exports to Japan of cotton cloths amounted to $1,154,274, and in 1907 our exports for cotton cloths amounted to only $140,000. This shows a decrease in our Japanese trade.

In 1906 all our exports of manufactured cotton cloths increased to practically all the foreign countries, and increased from $43,320,542 in 1905 to $52,181,860 in 1906.

In 1907 our exports to the countries above named decreased from $53,181,860 to $21,239,247, principally on the Chinese and Japanese trade. China decreased from $29,641,188 in 1906 to $5,714,191 in 1907.

The United Kingdom has the best cotton goods trade with China and Japan and we are second. Our trade abroad has been sadly neglected—that is, our trade in manufactured cotton goods. There is much that can and should be done along this line. Our manufacturers of cotton goods are and have been for the last two years manifesting more interest in their business than ever before. The fact that the producer is demanding a better price for his cotton than he formerly did is causing the manufacturers to look for broader fields and larger sales. We must send agents to the foreign field, learn their methods of doing business and the tastes and desires of the people, find out the kind of goods they want, and manufacture them. With England, Germany, and France active in these foreign countries, it is up to us to go after our share of this foreign trade, and not sit supinely down and expect it to come to us. Like the old darky who prayed for the good Lord to send him a turkey on Christmas. Twice he had gone down on his knees, pleading for the turkey to be sent him, but the turkey didn't come, and Erastus changed the form of his prayer, saying, before he prayed:

> De Lawd ain't agwine ter do nuthin fer you, what you can do fer yu'sef. Gude Lawd, gib me de power and de ambishun to move swif'ly, an' befo de moon gits up and de pepul begins ter stir, sen me fer de turkey whut I ben er prayin fer.

And before the clock struck 12 that night Erastus had stormed the roost of his white neighbor and carried home in sable triumph the choicest gobbler of the turkey tribe. [Laughter and applause.] Like old Erastus, if we want a fair share of this foreign cotton trade we must go after it. [Applause.]

Our exports of raw, or unmanufactured, cotton for the years 1905, 1906, and 1907 are as follows:

To all foreign countries in 1905, 8,337,964 bales; value, $379,965,014.

In 1906 the total exports of raw or unmanufactured cotton amounted to 7,050,356 bales, amounting to $401,005,921.

In 1907 the total exports of raw or unmanufactured cotton amounted to 8,708,469 bales, with a value of $481,277,797. It will thus be seen that each successive crop since 1905 brought increased millions of money to this country.

An increase of over $21,000,000 in 1906 over 1905, and an increase of $80,272,441 in 1907 over the amount received from foreign countries in 1906. Good prices for cotton help the whole country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is another branch of the cotton industry to which I will now refer, and I wish to quote what Col. Robert J. Lowry, of Atlanta, Ga., said recently:

Now the cotton plant is a wonderful thing. The actual cotton staple is not all that the South gets from this product of the soil. The by-products of cotton have added millions to the annual income of the South. Take, for instance, last year, 1906. The total cotton crop, as I have previously stated, was 13,500,000 bales. This produced approximately 6,500,000 tons of seed. Sixty per cent of this appproximately was sold to the cottonseed-oil mills, or, say, 3,900,000 tons of seed. A ton of seed will yield approximately 40 gallons of cottonseed oil, about 800 pounds of meal, 700 pounds of hulls, and 35 pounds of lint. This yield, at prices ruling during last year, would be $21.77 per ton of seed. At $21.77 per ton last year the income from the cottonseed was $84,903,000.

The manufacture of by-products from cotton seed is comparatively a recent enterprise. Several cotton seed oil mills had been built in the United States as early as 1840, but it was as late as 1870 before the industry was considered as being of commercial importance. The statistics will afford a striking example of progress in this line, which would almost stagger one who had not watched its annual growth as it progressed. Before the advent of the oil mills, about the only value attached to cotton seed was for planting and fertilizing. From the raw cotton seed we get three distinctive parts from which the by-products are manufactured—that is, linters, hulls, and meats. From the linters—that is, the reginning to take up the adhering short cotton—we manufacture carpets, rope, and twine. With the hulls we can fertilize, or make paper, or we can feed cattle. Especially is this food desirable for cattle when mixed with cotton-seed meal. For a long time the hulls were considered as fit for only fuel or oil-mill engines, but when it was discovered that hull ashes possessed qualities of fertilization, then their commercial value was at once recognized. From the meat of the cotton seed we get, first, crude oil and cake and meal. From the cake and meal we get a good fertilizer, or, when mixed with hulls, a most excellent food for cattle. The crude oil, when passed through the first refining process, yields summer yellow oil and soap stock. This summer yellow oil is of varying quality and, of course, is subject to further refining to produce better soap stock, winter yellow oil, stearin, and summer white oil. From the soap stock we get soap, from the stearin we get butter oil, salad oil, and emulsion, and from the summer white oil we get lard compound.

The by-products of the cotton plant are continually on the increase, for experiments show us still further valuable characteristics of this most wonderful plant. A very high-class food known as white cottolene is made by mixing hog lard with highly refined cotton-seed oil. It is now believed that the cotton-seed meal can be properly manufactured into a nutritious food for human beings, being cheaper than flour and containing more of the fats necessary to the human system. Even confectioners have found that parched kernels of the cotton seed are valuable substitutes for peanut brittle and other candies.

Mr. Chairman, when I used to chop cotton and follow a mule around the row I never dreamed that it contained candy for children and food for men. [Laughter and applause.]

Speaking of experiments, it may be said in this connection that it has been but recently discovered that the yield of lint can be increased approximately 10 per cent by allowing the seed cotton, after picking, to rest a month or so before ginning. In other words, the lint continues to grow during these few weeks from the nourishment which the seed imparts to the lint. Intelligent farmers have recognized this as a scientific fact and are profiting by that knowledge. The South's cotton crop this year is estimated by Mr. Richard H. Edmunds, editor of the Manufacturers' Record, an eminent authority, at $900,000,000. If all of the cotton was allowed to rest, so to speak, for a month or two before ginning, you can readily see what the lint growth would mean in dollars as a further complement to the possibility of this wonderful cotton plant. Experiments are also being made with the cotton stalk and boll, which are believed to be a good paper stock.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few more words about cotton.

Cotton is more widely used now than ever before and its uses are increasing every day. The high prices of wool, linen, and silk are causing cotton to be more widely used than ever. Many articles of dress and ornament formerly made of linen and of silk are now made of mercerized cotton. "Cotton," says Charles W. Dabney, former Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, "on account of its cheapness and its many excellencies, is rapidly superseding its several rivals," meaning, of course, wool, silk, and linen.

Cotton is substituted for woolen goods and can be manufactured into cloth so resembling wool that you have to apply the chemical test to tell the difference. The substitution of mercerized cotton yarn for silk has greatly affected the silk trade. The census of manufactures obtained by the Government shows that the business of the silk manufacturers is being invaded. Cotton is about to put the silkworm out of business, and in competition with this white fiber of the field the sheep shows traces of tire. [Laughter and applause.] The great increase in the consumption of artificial silk (mercerized cotton) is accounted for by its adaptability for braids, fringes, dress trimmings, etc. The consumption of cotton yarns by the manufacturers of woolen goods has also greatly increased.

A bale of cotton worth $50 when manufactured into sheetings and denims is worth from $200 to $600; when made into thread or lace it will bring from $1,500 to $2,000.

A bale of cotton worth $50 will bring the producer about twelve dollars and a half clear profit. The spinner upon an average, at the very least, makes $35 on the bale clear profit. On the principle of live and let live let's divide the profit and take $12 from the spinner and give it to the producer. Then the division of profits is more equal—the producer has twenty-four dollars and a half and the spinner twenty-three. This difference on a crop of 13,000,000 bales would amount to $100,000,000 to the producer. A Frenchman, familiar with cotton and its various uses, says that the "spinner realizes from forty to fifty dollars profit on every bale of cotton."

When cotton fares well in the market our people are prosperous and happy. Here are some figures that show what good cotton prices have done for our people. Total deposits in Southern banks in 1900, $375,000,000. Total deposits in 1906, $995,000,000. [Applause.] Cotton is the basis of credit in all the South's business transactions.

We have been taught that the law of supply and demand was as fixed and as certain of enforcement as the law of the Medes and Persians, but not so always. We have seen the cotton exchanges in the United States and Liverpool defy and set aside the law of supply and demand, and by their unholy practice obtain a cotton crop at destructive prices to the farmer. They have been the means of bankrupting the farmer and impoverishing his soil. The price he received for cotton did not afford a profit and its production being unprofitable, the farmer was rendered unable to care for his soil and improve it as he should have. These exchanges have robbed the Southern farmer every year of millions of dollars. The uncertainty that has ranged around the price of cotton and the constant fluctuation of the price and the lack of means by which the producer could be assured that his cotton would not be a drug on the market have kept him in a state of embarrassment and despondency. This evil of the speculator that has preyed upon our cotton industry so long must be destroyed. This gambling exchange is not a help but a hindrance to the producer. It is not a friend, but a dangerous enemy to the farmer. It is not a blessing, but a curse to the South. [Applause.]

That competition is the life of trade is and has always been a cardinal principle of the Democratic party. What the producer needs is an open market—open to the world. In order to obtain this he must fight anything and everything that hinders competitive buying. Like greedy vampires these leeches of the exchange fasten upon the producers and cotton dealers of the South in the harvest time, and they suck and drain our industrial life blood to feed their putrid veins. [Applause.]

Time was when the professional speculator, hoary in evil practice and corrupt methods, wanted us to crowd the market and part with our cotton at a low price he would publish thrilling, extraordinary stories about the cotton plant and its productive prospects in foreign countries. They would tell us of the discovery of a cotton tree—and this was always just before or about the time we commenced to sell cotton—sometimes it was in Australia, then in India, and the last one made its appearance, I believe, in Africa. They would try to frighten us into believing that these trees, wild in the woods, were heavily burdened with cotton and all that was necessary to be done was to shake the tree and the ground in an instant would be white as snow. [Laughter and applause.]

Or, they would fill the newspapers with stories to the effect that India was about to put us out of the cotton business, and when they deemed it necessary, they threatened us with large crops of cotton in China and Japan. They talked and wrote about it as if the cotton plant was a stranger in those parts and that the people there were just now making efforts to grow it, when the fact is India produced cotton and cotton goods over three thousand years ago, and the army of Xerxes wore uniforms made of cotton. The Greeks used a kind of cotton goods for saddle blankets three hundred years before Christ. Cotton sacks are mentioned in the tales of the Arabian Nights, and Cortez used cotton to stuff the jackets of his soldiers to protect them from the arrows of the natives.

Blankets made of cotton have been found in the ancient tombs of Peruvian mummies. In the heyday of the republic India muslin made of cotton was worn and highly prized by the coquettish dames of Rome.

In the far-off time of the Pharaohs cotton was worn as headdress by the dark-eyed Egyptian women and prized for its beauty and its glory. It grew in sight of the Pyramids and cotton robes were worn by the priests of Egypt. Wicks woven of cotton burned in the temples of the Hindoo, and cotton constituted the holy pillows for the priests. It nodded its white plumes to Alexander the Great and his conquering armies. It flourished along the Ganges and bowed its white head in grief when heathen mothers offered up their infant offspring to the cruel gods of a false religion. [Applause.] Cotton is no stranger to the Old World. It came to America with our fathers, and its white fiber has been our constant companion and helpful friend. The cotton seed was not content until it found lodgment in Southern soil, and cotton did not assert his kingly prerogative until he took up his abode in the land of pure democracy and a Southern sun kissed his snowy crown and bade him clothe the world. [Applause.] Now we see a crowned old monarch, his arm entwined about a lovely woman at his side, and written beneath them, "King Cotton and his Darling Democracy," Here, king cotton reigns in snowy splendor, and his royal subjects are at last showing appreciation of their vantage ground in the world of agriculture and are manifesting signs of independence in their manufacturing industries, their commercial establishments, and financial institutions. [Applause.]

The producer is not going to rest until the cotton business is placed upon a level with the best regulated business concerns of the country. It requires money, labor and time to make cotton and the producer is entitled to a fair price for it. Manufacturing and mercantile enterprises are not left to the mercy of the speculator, but they are conducted upon the soundest business principles. Why, then, should not the cotton traffic upon which all these other industries depend be protected by law and conducted on sound business principles? Discussing the question of money to move the Southern cotton crop of 1907, a New York banker said:

It may be that the Southern Cotton Planters' Association will be successful this year (speaking of 1907) in holding back the staple from the market so as to prevent the sacrifice in values that in other years has been caused by rushing the crop to market in order to enable planters to pay their debts.

A. B. Coles, a banker, discussing cotton as collateral in the Southern Banker, said to the bankers:

Be diligent in the matter of knowing personally that the cotton is actually in existence.

The farmer does not object to this, but he does object to these exchanges selling cotton that is not actually in existence and by so doing destroy the price of cotton that is actually in existence. [Applause.] If we must have cotton exchanges, let's have them like the Bremen cotton exchange in Germany. Its members are not allowed to speculate in cotton futures, and this exchange is devoted entirely and expressly to handling spot cotton. It is against the laws of Germany for her citizens to speculate or gamble in staple commodities of any kind. Germany has thrown the arms of a righteous law around the great agricultural interests of her people, while the United States under the reign of the Republican party permits the speculator to fatten upon the substance of the great producing classes. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to read from an editorial in the Review of the London Magazine of Commerce. It is entirely germane to the subject under discussion and pays a high compliment to one who has spent the best years of his life fighting the "bull" and "bear" gamblers in options and futures. This is what it says:

THE ECONOMIC RUIN OF THE WORLD.

In every age there are a few men who have one great aim in view. They devote their lives to the end that they have set for themselves; they concentrate all their efforts on their chosen destiny; and neither cold opposition nor callous ridicule can swerve them from their path. History gives us many examples of the type. To this class of enthusiasts belongs Mr. Charles W. Smith (of England), who for thirty years has been endeavoring to obtain legislative restriction of international gambling in options, futures and warrants. The simple fact stands forth that gambling in fictitious commodities is an evil which has often dealt widespread ruin. Everybody admits that gambling in fictitious commodities is a pest with spasmodic eruptions of a very dangerous kind. Mr. Smith is doing yeoman service in educating the public into the existence of the evil.

Mr. Smith says:

Let the world's agriculturists' one united cry be, "Away with all fictitious international dealings in options and futures" and "Down with that enemy to humanity—the 'bear' operator—who for the past thirty years has been sucking our very life blood." Let each government also remember that agriculture is the national industry of every country; that it is the backbone of all countries; that land is the first and most important of all raw materials; that without a prosperous agriculture a nation must perish; and, lastly, that the world's agriculture is now of an international character, like its commerce and finance, and exerts everywhere a great influence on the destiny of nations.

And continuing he says:

We demand that the prices of the world's commodities shall in the future be governed by the economic laws of the world's supply and demand, and not as at the present and in the past, by bull and bear gambling operations in nonexisting products and by the manipulations thereof, for the sole benefit of the gamblers, through options and future contracts. Surely all governments will see there is nothing but absolute justice in these propositions. The course of prices for agricultural products should be fixed in the future, so far as is possible, through the medium of the producers.

Again Mr. Smith says:

The Austrian Government proposes that all gambling operations in options and futures of cereals, without the obligation of delivery, entered into by any persons residing in Austria, either on the Bourse of Budapest or those of any other foreign country, shall be treated as illegal, and the said operations come under the penal clauses of the Austrian bill. This is as it should be in all countries.

Listen to this appeal from the same high source:

Finally—

Says Mr. Smith—

I can only express a prayer that the governments of those nations who have not yet legislated will, in the interest of humanity, see that legislation is absolutely essential in order to support those who have already done so, not only in their own national and individual interests, but also in those of the world's. Let us checkmate the world's grave economic, moral, and spiritual perils, which bankers, capitalists, and market gamblers, through the medium of these international gambling operations, are slowly but surely bringing upon all God's creatures.

[Applause.]

Speaking of the evils of speculation in his own country, this great enemy of the gambling exchange said:

And the world will have to realize that these sentiments are applicable to all other nations. But it is through the unjust power of these international gambling operations in the world's stock, produce, and metal exchanges that these unscrupulous men of wealth have been enabled to become predatory, and thereby directly and indirectly to exploit all properties, including land and labor. The result is that all men's private properties have been turned into "gambling counters," and this in order to establish on the world's exchanges "a Monte Carlo without the music," at which the great international capitalists and market gamblers preside and hold the bank, to the jeopardy of one and all.

Further, it is by such deadly "bull and bear" international gambling weapons that these men have also cunningly and secretly obtained the key to the financial, agricultural, and commercial conquest of the world. I maintain I have ample justification in denouncing international financial and commercial gambling in "options and futures" as standing out as the greatest of all perils which the world has to contend with in the future, in connection with preserving the rights of property, as well as upholding the liberty and privileges of the people.

It is a matter of personal gratification, after nearly twenty years of laborious public work carried on all over the civilized world, to be able to place on record for the benefit of my fellow-countrymen how, notwithstanding the secret antagonism of the world's market capitalists and of the press which they control, the truth of the views I have been preaching. Let me briefly set forth for the benefit, especially of the British Government, the numerous examples of the ruin caused to Egypt during the past two years only by Bourse gambling, not only in stocks and shares, but also in cotton and other products.

In 1905 the Egyptian cotton manufactory was ruined. In 1906 the Egyptian Society of Sugar Refineries was declared bankrupt. In 1906–7 the Egyptian speculators lost enormous sums of money in gambling operations in "futures" of Egyptian and American cotton on the exchanges in Egypt and in Liverpool. Since 1906 there has been a prolonged period of financial depression, caused solely by overspeculation and rank gambling.

Mr. Chairman, comment is unnecessary. The truth of his contention is apparent to every Member of this House, and the evils of speculation, the suffering and want that have followed in its wake, are known to millions of producers in the South and in the West. Let this Congress meet the issue honestly and fearlessly, and grant the relief here asked for. [Applause.]

In 1900, there were 400 bucket shops and gambling exchanges in the United States. In six years the number increased to 1,000. Now there are shrewd market manipulators and a gang of gamblers backed by large interests who have designs on the cotton crop every year. Arrayed on that side are men of brains and men of millions. Let us not underestimate their strength, but rather let us admit that they are strong, unprincipled, and powerful. They are the trained soldiers of a warfare that has cost the South millions and millions of dollars—that has sown the horrors of debt and mortgage upon the homes and farms of our people. The Farmers' Union and the Southern Cotton Association routed these robbers in 1906 and carried out the scriptural idea of "Breaking the jaws of the wicked and plucking the spoil out of their teeth." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to an editorial which appeared last week in the Saturday Evening Post. Discussing speculation in commodities, it said:

First and last, a lot of money is made out of this gambling. Otherwise it would not continue. Whether the bull finally gets this money, or the bear, or simply the broker, does not matter. Whoever gets it does not earn a penny of it. He does not produce or transport or distribute a bushel of grain or a pound of cotton. He contributes absolutely nothing to industry itself. He merely sits outside and bets on it. So that the money that is made in speculation, whatever the amount and whoever receives it, is just so much scooped out of the wealth that the country produces, with no return on the scooper's part.

This editorial, though brief, properly characterizes the speculator and his nefarious profession. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in some letters recently written to Mr. E. J. Cook, secretary of the Farmers' Union of Alabama, and published in the Farmers' Union Guide, is some interesting reading. These letters are written by members of the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges. Evidently the New York man did not know what the New Orleans man was writing or had written, for the New York man says, "Our future market is robbed of its natural support by continued adverse legislation," while the New Orleans man says, "Restricted legislation has deprived this market of its natural support—the southern speculator—thereby transferring the balance of power to New York and Liverpool, whose interests naturally are always against higher prices." Both admit that cotton should bring 15 cents per pound, but they suggest that the way to do that is to let the exchange alone and let it have its way.

Now, the New York Exchange can say truthfully that the New Orleans Exchange is also naturally opposed to high prices—and all these exchanges now are, because they are dominated by interests that want cheap cotton. [Applause.]

In a speech delivered recently in New Orleans, the home of one of the cotton exchanges, Mr. Paul M. Potts, president of the Louisiana State Cotton Association, said:

The establishment of these cotton-future trading boards was a deathblow to the producers of cotton and the country merchants, because it enabled the speculator to carry 10,000 or more of bales of future cotton or paper contracts with the same amount of money invested that he would have to invest to carry 1,000 bales of actual or spot cotton, and the effect of it is to make spot cotton a drug on the market subject to the whims and caprices of the heartless speculator. New York futures to-day, October 25, 1907, are nearly 2 cents per pound under the price paid at interior points in the South for actual spot cotton.

It is a far graver question than ever the Louisiana Lottery dared to be. The lottery only injured directly the purchasers of lottery tickets, but the operations of the cotton gambling exchanges injure directly every man, woman, and child in the South who are dependent on cotton. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is no getting around the proposition here laid down. Mr. Potts strikes full in the face the great evil that now so sorely disturbs the cotton industry of the South.

The president of the Farmers' Union of the United States, Mr. Charles S. Barrett, of Georgia, said recently:

The time has come when the speculator and the gambler must be eliminated from the cotton trade, and the spinner must come direct to the farmer for his supply of raw material.

Mr. Harvie Jordan, of Georgia, president of the Southern Cotton Association, said in a speech some days ago:

Cotton exchanges have so grossly abused their privileges and have become so detrimental to legitimate trade that they can not now claim to have any lawful reason to exist, and should be promptly outlawed from every civilized community in both America and Europe.

Mr. B. Cameron, of North Carolina, president of the Farmers' National Congress, said to me a few days ago:

I regard speculation in farm products as the greatest evil with which the farmer has to deal, and I trust that your bill to prevent gambling in cotton futures will become a law.

Mr. Chairman, I bring to you and to this House these messages and expressions from the chosen leaders of the great army of American producers. I submit that these men, occupying high and responsible places in their organizations and in the confidence and esteem of those they represent, are entitled to be heard in the interest of just and fair legislation. Back of them is the producer, who denounces the gambling exchange, and he pleads with Congress for deliverance from its blighting curse. [Applause.]

Six months ago, Mr. Chairman, the cotton growers and cotton spinners of the world met in Atlanta, Ga., in the greatest cotton congress that the world ever saw. I was a delegate, representing the cotton growers of Alabama, and in that convention I introduced the following resolution:

Whereas the uncertainty that ranges around the price of cotton produced by speculation in cotton futures now indulged in by certain exchanges, causing the market to fluctuate many times a day, is antagonistic to the spinner, to the consumer, and the producer of cotton;

Be it resolved by the International Conference of Cotton Growers and Manufacturers in convention assembled, That we earnestly request the Congress of the United States and the Parliament of Great Britain to so regulate such exchanges doing an interstate and international business that gambling in cotton futures shall be prohibited and so that the seller in the exchange shall be compelled in good faith to deliver the cotton sold and the grade agreed upon at the time and place specified in the contract.

This resolution was referred to the committee on buying and selling. This committee was composed of spinners and producers. The members representing the spinners opposed it, and those representing the producers favored it. Chairman W. W. Welch, of Mississippi, a farmer, acting for the committee, reported it to the congress, saying:

Your committee recommends the adoption of Congressman Heflin's resolution to prohibit by law dealing in cotton futures.

I will here read from the Atlanta Constitution's report of the proceedings of that day:

Gambling in cotton futures and whether it was wise to adopt the resolution of Congressman HEFLIN was the question which consumed the greater part of the Wednesday morning session of the growers and spinners' conference.

Vigorous speeches on the question were made by both the growers and spinners. The growers, with one accord, indorsed the Heflin resolution, which was favorably reported by the committee on buying and selling cotton; but the foreign spinners, while condemning gambling in futures, were advocates of the cotton exchange.

Mr. Chairman, I was convinced at that cotton conference that the spinner had and held a very cordial relation with the cotton speculator. They could join us in condemning gambling in futures, but when the time came for action they stood by their old and trusted friend, the gambling exchange. My resolution calling on Congress and the Parliament of Great Britain to prohibit gambling in cotton futures in these two countries was unanimously indorsed by the Farmers' Union and the Southern Cotton Association; but the spinners were hard to enthuse on the subject, and they voted to postpone the matter for another year. Now then, to my mind it did and does appear that the spinners and the speculators are mutual friends.

Theodore Price, a well-known operator of New York, in 1905 denounced the South's effort to organize and hold her cotton for a fair price as an "oppressive trust." He said: "That this attempt will fail is a foregone conclusion." He further said: "The South's effort to organize and hold cotton was economical suicide." Well, Mr. Chairman, if that is suicide, the pity is that we didn't commit that particular kind of suicide long ago. Again we see spinner and speculator together, and Theodore Price addressed the cotton manufacturers in a convention in Philadelphia in 1906. He assured them that this movement to demand a fair price for cotton would accomplish nothing and sought to stimulate their faith in him and other speculators to manipulate the price, as they had done so often before.

Mr. Chairman, let us go back to the old days for a moment. Time was when cotton dealers in New York only bought and offered for sale cotton to arrive, and this cotton was actually on its way to New York. Then there was demand for cotton itself, and men bought it and sold it to the manufacturer and others who desired cotton. Here the law of supply and demand was the law of the cotton market. The producer then had an open market, and cotton, not margins, was in demand. How is it now, Mr. Chairman? They do not buy or sell cotton to arrive—cotton on its way to New York—but they offer for sale in unlimited quantities a fictitious stuff which they please to call cotton, and by so doing they injuriously affect the price of the real product. They substitute a sham sale for a transaction in real cotton, and this to the great injury of the producer. [Applause.] Time was when the cotton buyer in Liverpool would go directly to the South to the cotton fields of the United States and there ascertain from the farmers and cotton merchants the price of cotton, and he bought his cotton there and it was shipped to him at Liverpool. Then the producer had something to say about the price of cotton. Then the cotton merchant and the cotton manufacturer based all of their operations in the cotton market upon the cotton actually produced or to be produced and nothing else. [Applause.] How different now. The cotton merchant has been outlawed and the manufacturer has turned away from the producer of cotton to the gambling exchange. And this exchange, under present methods, handling fictitious stuff and dealing in margins, has been in operation for years to the detriment of the great army of cotton producers. [Applause.] You buy a paper contract, say for a hundred bales of cotton, you do not have to pay the full value of the cotton—in fact you are only required to put up anywhere from one to five dollars per bale, and on a hundred-bale contract with $100 you can affect the price of $6,000 worth of cotton. But one of the members of the New York Exchange says that—this plan is good for the buyer, because he does not have to dig into his pocket at the outset and pay the full value of the cotton and saddle himself with interest, warehouse charges, insurance, etc.

Mr. Chairman, this declaration of itself is enough to convince any man that the cotton exchange as run to-day is not the friend of the producer. [Applause.] It does not consider the amounts invested in farm lands, in farming implements and expended for labor. None of these things concern the gambler in the exchange. They trade in contracts, and no cotton is demanded or delivered. The number of bales handled in a season is not measured by the number of bales actually produced in the United States, for the New York Exchange alone sells in a single season a hundred million bales—nearly ten times the amount of the real crop. They sell something that is not in existence—something that they do not own and hence can not deliver. Let your buyer of a hedge buy in good faith and expect delivery, and let the seller sell in good faith intending to deliver. If these cotton exchanges were compelled by law to have behind every contract for future delivery the actual cotton to deliver, the producer could not and would not complain; but he does complain, because thousands of these paper contracts are of the wild-cat kind and represent no real values, and into outrageous competition with these the real producer is drawn.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the producer must be relieved of the outrageous and destructive competition to which he is now subjected by the speculator who offers upon the exchange a fictitious product which he can not and does not intend to deliver. These gambling exchanges buy and sell a fictitious product, and the price that they fix is intended to determine the price of the entire cotton crop. This obnoxious method deprives the farmer of his right to a voice in fixing the price of this important product—a right which is accorded other producers. [Applause.]

The South wants an honest market and such prices as will follow the unhampered operation of the law of supply and demand. We want to return to the principle which is as old as commercial intercourse itself, and that is that the seller shall be compelled in good faith to deliver the commodities sold at the time and place specified in the contract. [Applause.]

If a man does not own a certain kind of property, but represents that he does and obtains money on it he can be punished for obtaining money under false pretenses. And this transaction in one sense only affects the party who loans the money and the party who practices the deceit. If a man obtains money or other thing of value, giving a mortgage on property that he does not own, he is guilty of a penitentiary offense and must wear stripes for his crime. And in this transaction only the mortgagor and the mortgagee are affected; and yet Congress permits the cotton gambler to obtain money by offering for sale something that he does not own and never expects to own, and through this evil performance in the speculators' exchange the real product upon which millions of people are dependent for a livelihood is injuriously affected. Is this treatment of the world's cotton producers fair and just? [Applause.]. Every buyer is the direct friend of the producer, for he buys, and under the free exercise of the law of supply and demand hopes to see the market sustained and advanced. To have this demand for cotton met with an artificial supply is antagonistic to the legitimate interests of the cotton industry and is a crime against the great body of cotton producers in this country. [Applause.]

The spinners are interested in seats on the New York Cotton Exchange. They are represented there—I mean spinners in this country and spinners in foreign countries, too—and vast millions are back of these men, and it is used from time to time to create a bear market, because the spinner wants to buy the raw material as cheap as possible and he has long since learned that the cotton exchange can be relied on as the handy instrument to accomplish this purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. The cotton exchange is very hard on the bucket shops. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks the bucket shops could last one minute without the cotton exchange to furnish quotations on which they bet?

Mr. HEFLIN. They could not. Mr. Chairman, the bucket shop is merely the crap shooter in the cotton game, while the exchange with a fixed hand is the stud-poker player in the great crime against the producer. [Laughter and applause.]

Here is the South Carolina law:

No dealing in futures permitted where the person contracting for the sale is not the actual owner, or agent for the owner of the commodity dealt in, or where it is not the intention of the seller actually to deliver, and of the buyer actually to receive. Penalty from $200 to $500, with possible imprisonment.

If I go into the exchange in the morning and can get a majority of the members, which is easy to do, as nearly all of them represent spinning interests, to join me in bearing the market, our success is assured and the producer is robbed. And this has been done without the use or the delivery of a single pound of cotton. The producer appears in the market with a hundred bales of real cotton to sell. Having counted the cost of production and knowing something of the demand for raw cotton and its value to the consuming world, he demands twelve and a half or fifteen cents per pound. Then your gambling exchange gets in its work, bears the market, and proposes to sell a hundred bales of something which it is allowed by law to call cotton for nine or ten cents per pound; and I submit that this criminal procedure, licensed by the law, is the deadly enemy of the producer and ought not to be countenanced for a day. [Applause.] The producer is entitled to fair prices and living profits. All that he asks Congress to do is to remove the licensed obstacle that stands between him and an open market—open at all times to everybody who wants cotton. Then the law of supply and demand will control. But now, when you have a few men constituting what they call a cotton exchange, with its limited membership of four hundred and fifty men, and every seat around the pit worth twelve thousand five hundred dollars, regulating the price of cotton always toward the bear side, the producer has no voice and no chance in the premises—he is an object of prey for their greed. The high licensed, close corporation millionaire club gather around the pit of the exchange, and there behind closed doors and in secret conclave the southern people are robbed—systematically robbed of a produce upon whose fair price depends the happiness and well-being of 26,000,000 people. [Applause.]

Mr. Arthur Marsh, member of the New York Cotton Exchange, says:

All the arteries of the cotton world lead not merely to New York, but to the very floor of the cotton exchange.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, and there behind closed doors they rob the South annually of millions and millions of dollars. We have seen this gambling in stocks and in products in New York lure money from legitimate channels, destroy legitimate business, paralyze commerce, and place southern and western producers at the mercy of those who would rob them of the fruits of their toil and cause the wails of a financial panic to be heard in all the States of the Union. [Applause.]

Employing the phraseology of another, let me say, "Why should we not be permitted to call upon the Government for aid as do the gambling-stricken banks when pressed by frenzied speculation?" The banks South and West help those directly engaged in gainful pursuits; their borrowers produce the merchandise that brings gold from its foreign hoarding place and that maintains the Treasury's reserve. Such aid would uplift the price of cotton, and every dollar thereby added is an American dollar—a dollar that circulates through the pockets of men whose sweat and sacrifice maintain the prestige of the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

New York, by governmental sanction, has become the financial tyrant of the United States. In the fall of 1907 eastern banks holding our securities failed and refused to let us have money already arranged for. Cotton speculators in New York urged southern bankers to withhold money from the farmer and force him to sell his cotton. Is it just or prudent that any one city or section should, by approval of the Government, financially dominate all other cities and sections? Shall the United States sublet, even in part, its prerogative that the regulation of money shall be by Congress, as provided in the Constitution? Can this Republic allow the first fruits of its soil to be exposed to the foreign bear or leave its protection to the mercy of speculators or the caprice of the banks of any city, or to the agony of an always possible Black Friday? In the name of the producers of the South and West I appeal for relief from the financial difficulties under which they now labor and for deliverance from the curse of gambling exchanges which doth now so sorely afflict us. For a long time these exchanges, intrenched by authority of the law and backed by many millions and undisturbed by anyone, flourished at the expense of the producer. The people knew that something was wrong, but they did not know just what it was. They saw the price of products rise and fall at the beck and call of the exchange, but the exchanges managed to have the price going down while the product was in the hand of the producer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. If it is short, I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to ask the gentleman if there ever has been any complaint of injustice done by the classification in New York?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes, sir; a thousand times. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has not the objection on the part of the cotton planters been more to the number of grades that have been established?

Mr. HEFLIN. The planter objects to the exchange and all of its nefarious practices. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, one of the chief advocates of the gambling exchange says that—speculation is chief among the means by which modern life combats the uncertainties of the future.

When the fact is, this speculation as now carried on is chief among the means by which a few men who control large sums of money and who concentrate it at the place of the exchange deprive the producer of any voice in fixing the price of his produce. More than that, Mr. Chairman, speculation in farm products as now allowed is chief among the means by which a coterie of nonproducers actually rob the producers, and by which a class of men with vast sums of money are threatening the great producing class with a condition of industrial slavery. The great agricultural interests of the United States cry out to Congress for frank recognition and equal rights with all other interests in all the marts of trade. Rome reached the zenith of her glory when she laid greatest stress and emphasis on her agricultural interests. When agriculture was exalted and became the first fruits of her consideration and care Rome was prosperous and happy, and never until the producer was ignored and agriculture neglected did she show any signs of decay. The agricultural classes of the United States beg you to remove from their path the gambling exchange which disturbs and destroys competitive buying. They plead for an open market—open to the world where all men who want cotton can bid and buy in the open. [Applause.]

One newspaper commenting on the effort to regulate cotton exchanges by Congress, says:

It will give a shock to the business interests of the country if the manufacturer of cotton cloth, or the millers, who often sell their product for future delivery at home or abroad at a time when they neither have cotton or wheat could not protect themselves by buying cotton or wheat for future delivery.

Mr. Chairman, it is not our purpose to disturb legitimate business; on the other hand, it is our purpose to encourage and protect legitimate business. If the manufacturer of cotton goods sells the output of his mills in advance and wants to be sure that he can get the cotton with which to manufacture the goods and meet his contracts, he can buy in good faith cotton for future delivery, and the legislation for which we ask will not affect him. But he must buy the cotton from people who intend to and who are capable of making the delivery. He is in the cotton business and wants and must have cotton. The grower is also in the cotton business; he employs his skill, expends his energies, and devotes his time to the production of this important crop, and when the cotton is produced it represents a year's toil, vast sums of money expended for land, labor, stock, and farming implements.

Unless the grower can sell his cotton for a fair and reasonable price he can not live decently and worthily. It costs more to produce cotton now than ever before. The legislation that we desire will not deprive the producer of the right to sell his cotton in good faith for future delivery. The cotton manufacturer has invested in his great enterprise vast sums of money. The farmer has invested in the great cotton-growing business vast sums of money. The grower and manufacturer must of necessity have an eye to the future. The producer is dependent upon the price and demand for raw cotton, and the manufacturer is dependent upon the price and demand for manufactured cotton goods, and the business of each should be left to the full and fair operation of the law of supply and demand. These men, growers and spinners, devote their money and their lives to the cotton business.

There is another class of men who are properly called cotton gamblers. They do not grow cotton and they do not spin or handle cotton in any way. They deal only in the speculative side of the market, where margins and paper contracts are substituted for actual cotton. The unfair and ridiculous competition to which this farcical performance subjects the grower deserves the condemnation of this House and of decent men everywhere. [Applause.]

The manufacturer must base his contract for future delivery of cotton goods upon his ability to secure a portion of the cotton crop to be grown out of the ground and not produced in chalk marks on the blackboard of a gambling exchange. [Applause.] The cotton gambler's contract is conceived in sin and born in iniquity. He bases his contract, not upon his desire or his ability to deliver cotton when sold, and the party with whom the sham sale is perfected does not expect or desire that actual delivery of cotton be made, and yet, by speculating in a fictitious product which they call cotton, the price of the real product is injuriously affected. I repeat, these men are cotton gamblers pure and simple. [Applause.]

The cost of production, the happiness and well-being of that great army of cotton producers in the South do not enter into their remorseless and thieving game. The man in the market with actual cotton for sale sees a fictitious product meeting the temporary demand for cotton, and his own product becomes a drug on the market. The price of cotton goods and the amount of the cotton supply coupled with the demand for both ought to and would shape the price of raw cotton if speculation in cotton futures were prohibited by law. The exchanges for a long time in spite of the bear market, which they created and upheld, succeeded in deceiving a great many of our people into believing that the cotton exchange, as operated in New York and New Orleans, were the friends of the producer. But now they are no longer deceived.

Before the South organized her producers the spinners contracted with the speculators for the year's supply of cotton; then the spinner did not care or bother about the cotton market. He had his cotton bought and the price agreed on. How did this leave the producer? In his unorganized condition he was helpless. The spinners who wanted cotton arranged with the speculator and retired from the scene, and the producer was left to the mercy of the speculator and the speculator was doing all in his power to buy the cotton as cheaply as possible. They contract to sell so many bales at a certain price, then they go to work to keep the price of cotton down. If they sold it for 7 cents and can buy it for 5 they have made 2 cents per pound on two-thirds of the crop, and should we make 11,000,000 bales it would be seventy-odd million dollars in the pockets of the gamblers. If 15 cents is a reasonable price for this cotton, and it is, the speculator backed by the spinner has robbed the producer of the difference between 5 cents and 15 cents on 11,000,000 bales, which is the enormous sum of $550,000,000.

We know the countries that need and must have cotton, and they know that we, and we alone, can grow cotton in abundance, and it is foolish to say that we must rely on cotton exchanges to exploit our cotton and tell us its value and cause us to have buyers.

This close corporation in New York called the cotton exchange deprives the producer of any voice in the conduct of the exchange. The cotton to be delivered by the exchange, or rather by any member, is submitted to the samplers and weighers of the New York Exchange. The producer has nothing to do with it; and upon all matters as to grade the members and their representatives act, and their decision is final. The members of the classification committee are salaried officers paid by the exchange, not by the producers, and the grade of cotton certified to is final and from it there is no appeal. So that all the dog-tail cotton in the country, once in New York and bearing a certificate of good character, a certificate issued by the exchange itself, serves their unholy purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I wish now to read a portion of the Agricultural Committee's report on the Hatch bill, which passed this House in the Fifty-third Congress, but was defeated in the Senate. The committee said in part:

The foundation principle of this bill, and that which runs all through it, is as old as the system of commercial trading, and for a hundred years or more in this country was not only the basis of all transactions but was honestly and universally adhered to; and that is that the seller shall be compelled in good faith to deliver the commodities sold at the time and place specified in the contract. Actual delivery was made the basis of all the original laws and rules of the boards of trade in this country as well as of Europe.

Every produce and every grain board of trade in the United States to-day has upon its rules the right of the buyer to demand and the obligation on the part of the seller to deliver what he agrees to sell for future delivery; and they always recognize this principle. They know, as every lawyer in the United States knows, that no contract without such a provision behind it can be enforced in any of the State courts of the Union or the United States courts. What the great body of the producers of the United States now complain of is that this principle is daily, hourly, and almost universally violated. Pretending to enforce a delivery of the commodity sold, they have invented ways and means, phrases and methods, to evade the plain provisions of their own laws, their own rules. This bill contemplates nothing that is not embraced in the rules of the boards of trade except that it will enforce the actual contracts made and absolutely prevent the open and flagrant violation of them. It provides that every contract made for future delivery of these commodities shall be terminated by an actual delivery, and not an evasive or simulative one, of the commodities sold. If the question is fairly presented it will be seen that only the speculative centers are affected by a measure of this kind. They have no interest in common with the producers. Inside the walls of their close-corporation structures they set up the mandate of markets, and no producer is permitted to approach the throne from which issue the edicts that destroy his prosperity. The producers, the shippers, the manufacturers, and the consumers alike are excluded from the daily sessions where the prosperity of the nation is made secondary to the manipulators of the price of food products.

It is simply amazing to me that Congress has permitted this condition of things to exist so long, for it is clear to every man who has given it any thought that the producer, under this system of speculation, is outraged and robbed. [Applause.]

Here is an exhibition of rascality and crime practiced and committed through the system of speculation now in vogue in New York:

NEW YORK, June 19, 1906.

The trial of E. S. Holmes, jr., formerly assistant statistician on the Department of Agriculture crop-reporting staff at Washington, who is charged with selling advance information about the crop reports of the Government, is arousing keen interest in Wall street. It will be recalled that in 1905 a serious charge was made by the Southern Cotton Growers' Association to the effect that the Department of Agriculture crop reports were being peddled out in advance to stock and cotton brokers and others. In other words, these reports were available to those desirous of operating on them at least twenty-four hours ahead of the official publications to the world at large. An official investigation was immediately demanded into the whole business, and is now being conducted at Washington. Mr. Louis C. Van Riper, the chief witness of the day, declared that Holmes had for a long time provided to the well-known cotton operator and manipulator, Mr. Theodore H. Price, advance information as to crop estimates, and had been paid liberally for so doing. The witness even went so far as to assert that Holmes had had, at the time in question, over $50,000 for his services in this direction.

And now, in defending speculation, Mr. Theodore Price, of New York, says:

Solomon, reputed the wisest of men, said, "Where there is no vision the people perish." In all literature—

there is no justification of speculation so vivid or trenchant as this statement. The world's great things have been done by men who are willing to take risks and whose willingness was inspired by the picture of success which they kept constantly before their minds and their ambitions.

Mr. Chairman, Solomon in all his glory never dreamed that an exchange gambler would employ the above quotation in justification of his crime. [Laughter and applause.] This man Price is authority on "vision," "pictures," "risks," and "willingness" to undertake great things. I have in mind a picture now, and Theodore Price is a conspicuous figure in it. He is looking toward the Agricultural Department in Washington, and there is revealed to his "vision" valuable statistical crop information, and this man of "risks" and great "undertakings" invades the secret service of the Government and offers to buy statistical data prior to the day fixed by law for its publication. He bought and used this information in his gambling operations; but this man of "risks" and great "undertakings" did not stop with that measure of crime against the producer and against the Government—he paid money to Holmes, of the statistical department, not merely for advance information regarding crop statistics, but he had the statistics changed and made the Government report tell a lie to the world. [Applause.] The producer was in a woeful fix. The exchange was robbing him at New York and there was a thief in the Department at Washington giving out information to Price and his kind.

Mr. Chairman, let me give you a brief statement from the grower's side of this question. He says:

A decline of $6 per bale within less than a week represents a serious loss. The fact that values could be thus annihilated without any just or reasonable cause is a consideration of grave importance. A man may waste his property or lose it through ignorance or mistaken judgment, but when one's property is taken from him by unexpected assault he loses not only his property, but his rights. It is therefore of the first importance that the agency inflicting such a loss be discovered, and the remedy for the wrong be found and applied.

Mr. Chairman, these speculators do not own a pound of cotton. What right have they to offer for sale cotton belonging to the producers in the South? No man is allowed to sell or offer to sell without authority from the owner stocks or bonds belonging to a certain railroad. No man can sell or offer to sell any share in a given corporation without the authority from the owner. If a man who has no stock in a certain railroad should offer for sale some of the shares or stocks in the exchange, those who really own the stocks would object to and stop the performance which might injuriously affect their property. Then are you surprised that the cotton grower should complain when men who do not own or have any connection at all with real cotton offer cotton for sale? Is railroad property or shares in a corporation more sacred than property in farm products? [Applause.]

The fact is the New York Cotton Exchange is the rottenest cotton-dealing establishment in the world. The outcast and refuse cotton of the world is in good standing at this exchange and serves their unholy purpose. Harvie Jordan, president of the Southern Cotton Association, found on his trip abroad that 9,000 bales of American cotton had been shipped from Liverpool to New York to fill July contracts. It was such a dirty low grade cotton that it had been refused on the Liverpool Exchange. [Applause.]

The Members of Congress from the South called on the Post-Office authorities at Washington to issue a fraud order against the New York Cotton Exchange on the ground that it was not doing a legitimate business, and we asked that the use of the mails be denied them. It was further charged that the cotton sold on contracts on the floor of the exchange was never delivered at all and that the cotton delivered in any instance was not of the middling grade, or its equivalent, but a rotten commodity which can not be spun. It is only fit for making horse collars and mattresses. We have caught them in the act of rascality, and now, when we are trying to put them out of business, when we have exposed their methods to the world—about twenty members profess to have had a change of heart, and they, together with Theodore Price, claim to want a revision of grades and a change of rules. These new converts remind me of the fellow who runs a blind tiger in the community until just before the grand jury meets, pretends to get religion, escapes prosecution, and when court adjourns, lo! the haunts that knew him once claim him and hold him as of yore. [Laughter and applause.] We have seen in the New York Exchange and the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, on the same day, a difference of from one cent to a cent and a half a pound, the highest being at New Orleans and the lowest being at New York. It has been estimated that the New York Cotton Exchange has cost the South $75,000,000 a year. This tremendous drain has been going on for a long time. My bill would put a stop to this exchange and its evils and put its gambling members in the penitentiary where they ought to be. Price is not now a member of the New York Exchange, but has a representative on the floor always. So, where is the difference?

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. For a question; my time is limited.

Mr. SMALL. I would like to know what legislation the gentleman thinks would accomplish the purpose of stopping this gambling.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am coming to that.

We must deny to the exchanges that gamble in futures the use of the telephone, telegraph lines, and the mails for gambling purposes, and wild speculating in cotton futures will cease. [Applause.]

Hereafter the producer is going to employ some business tact. He is going to count his own time, the cost of labor, and in fact the cost of everything that enters into the production of cotton; and then he is going to display a measure of intelligence by adding a little profit. Not until the producers asserted themselves through their organizations did the spinners ever talk of dealing directly with the producers of cotton. Never, until we branded these professional gamblers in cotton futures as enemies to the cotton growers did foreign spinners want to make our acquaintance and talk business with us. These spinners responded to the exchanges, and the exchanges made them perform like jumping jacks. They were ready to make any announcement about cotton, or trouble at the mills—anything that would serve their purpose. With these shrewd rascals in the exchange backed by the combined power of the spinners the producer was helpless until he organized. Now he stands up in the open, and by concert of action through his organizations demands that Congress destroy the cotton gambler. [Applause.] And many things testify to the fact that the producer as organized is becoming a power in the land. He has been able in two years to bring the foreign spinners across the seas and through the country down to the cotton belt for the purpose of getting acquainted with the producer of cotton, and to bring about a better relation between spinner and producer. In other words, by your assistance, we will cause the spinner to realize that he must look hereafter to the producer and not to the speculator for the price of cotton. How things have changed in the past two years. Not long ago the only discussion that we indulged in concerning cotton was, will the crop be large or small, and what do you suppose we'll get for it. How about it now? Conventions are being held at home and abroad by manufacturers and producers, and the subject they are discussing is cotton. The questions with us now are not so much as to whether the crop will be large or small, and how much will they give us for it, but the questions are, how shall we destroy the enemies of cotton, what is a fair and reasonable price, and how much shall we demand?

Mr. Chairman, all that the cotton producer asks is an open market free from the tricks of trade employed in the exchange. These cotton gamblers have their own bureau of information and they manufacture whatever is necessary to serve their purpose. Here is a sample. Not long ago Theodore Price sent out a letter saying that the cotton crop would be eleven million bales. The ink was hardly dry upon that circular until he issued another one saying the crop would be thirteen million bales. This man spends thousands of dollars a day sending messages over the country practicing in a new way the old, old game of "come into my parlor, said the spider to the fly." [Applause.]

The wool grower does not have an exchange to inform him of the value of wool, and yet he has prospered when the cotton grower was hard pressed and helpless in the hands of the exchange. No exchange stands in the market path of the hay crop, and yet the hay crop in the United States is of greater value than the cotton crop.

The gambling exchange has ruined more men in the South than we can ever know. It has robbed us of millions every year. It has destroyed homes once happy and prosperous. It has sent men raving to the madhouse and others reeling into the suicide's grave. [Applause.]

This cotton gambler has demanded a frightful sacrifice of manhood and honor. There is scarcely a community in the South where you can not find the foot tracks of this remorseless monster. Gambling in cotton futures is one of the meanest forms of gambling—it ruins morally the speculator and destroys the price of a product upon which millions of our people depend.

Hon. William Jennings Bryan, that able and fearless champion of the people, said in a speech in New York a few days ago that—

> Measured by the number of suicides caused by the New York exchanges, Monte Carlo is an innocent pleasure resort by comparison, and the men who operated the Louisiana State Lottery never did a tithe of the harm that the grain gamblers, cotton gamblers, and stock gamblers of New York do every day.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, cotton deserves better treatment than it is now receiving at the hands of the Federal Government. Cotton has done more to maintain America's credit abroad and to keep it on a sound financial basis than all other commodities combined. The failure of no one crop would so affect the world as the failure of the cotton crop. Millions of people would be thrown out of employment and millions more would suffer and shiver in the cold. Upon the cotton plant and its snowy offspring rests the financial structure of this Government. Destroy the crop one year and you will take out of circulation in the United States a hundred millions more money than the entire national bank currency of the United States. [Applause.] Destroy the crop for one year and you will paralyze the financial institutions of our country. In the catalogue of commodities, cotton is the master production—the most readily cashed and the most widely consumed among the great staples of the world. [Applause.]

Cotton is the only product in the kingdom of agriculture every pound of which is converted into money and every dollar's worth of which contributes to the financial wealth of the United States. Our raw cotton that goes abroad sends back to us five hundred million dollars of gold. This is more than the combined exports of all other agricultural products. [Applause.]

In view of the great service that cotton is now rendering the United States in bringing gold into our country and giving to us the balance of trade, I submit to this House that the great cotton industry of the United States is entitled to fair treatment at the hands of Congress [applause], and, Mr. Chairman, if you accord to it the fair treatment that we ask, you will continue the service of expert cotton agents in foreign countries, and you will destroy the power of the gambling exchange to fix the price of a produce upon which millions of people are dependent. [Applause.]

Let this Congress commission more men to go into the lands beyond the seas looking after our foreign trade and unfurling the banner of the cotton industry of the United States—displaying and urging the use of cotton goods. England, Germany, and France have by this character of service injured our trade, and in self-defense we must follow their example in the use of these expert agents. Do this, and as the rulers of old went to Solomon for wisdom these cotton-using countries will come to us for the wherewith to be clothed [applause], and the day will come when the United States will be not only first in the production of cotton, but first, as it should be, in the manufacture and sale of cotton goods the world over. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the attention of the world is turned to the South when in the spring of the year the farmer prepares his soil and places seed in the ground. Sunbeams dance on the surface, refreshing showers seek and find their hiding place, and lo! germination begins. Little plants push the clods away and smile at the sun. Gentle zephyrs kiss their tender faces and breathe into them the message of their world mission. [Applause.] We hear the music of the hoe and the song of the happy plowman. Proud and graceful the little stalks stand mantled in leaves and ladened with squares. We look again and thousands of white blossoms are nodding welcome to the gold-belted bees. In a little while they are rosy red, then they assume a golden hue, and finally fade and fall, leaving behind them tiny green spheres. Basking in sunshine and reveling in shower, these flourish until autumn winds whisper to every full-grown boll "Open Sesame." [Applause.] Then the cotton stalk flings its fleecy fiber to the breeze and busy fingers pluck it from the boll. Now we hear the hum of the old cotton gin, the seed fall down on the floor below and lint comes out in swirls of snow. [Applause.] Yonder at the cotton factory, hard by the cotton field, we hear the tremulous voice of industry in the concert of whirling spindles wooing the fiber into cloth, and the finished product goes out upon the pulsating tide of a splendid commerce, and cotton is King—King of American exports—and in all its ramifications is basis for the greatest manufacturing interest in the world. [Prolonged cheers and applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I have received a memorial addressed to the delegation from North Carolina in this House, which I have thought of sufficient importance to incorporate in the RECORD, and I shall ask the Clerk to read it in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the North Carolina Members of the Sixtieth Congress of the United States of America:

Convinced that it is an imperative duty of the United States to have an adequate Navy;

Believing that the conditions which confront a nation, not the opinions or preferences of its citizens, determine what is an adequate Navy;

Persuaded that a misapprehension is prevalent regarding this question, and regarding the relation of national armament and international arbitration to each other and to the peace and prosperity of the people, the undersigned respectfully suggest the wisdom of appointing a commission composed of competent persons, including:

An eminent international jurist.

A member of the Senate and a Member of the House of Representatives.

A member of the Pan-American Conference.

A member of The Hague Conference.

A leading representative of the commercial and labor organizations of the country, and such other persons as will make the commission truly representative of the interests affected, this commission being charged with the duty of fully investigating arbitration and armament in their relation to each other and to the national welfare.

Meanwhile your petitioners respectfully urge the granting of the request of the Navy Department for the battle ships deemed necessary, after careful and conscientious investigation by Admiral Dewey and others who have not hesitated to face every danger at the nation's command and who desire primarily to preserve peace and establish justice, not to wage war.

If the proposed commission should find that the Navy Department has overestimated present needs, subsequent Congresses can decrease their naval appropriations, whereas if a crisis comes before proper preparation is made the disastrous consequences of neglect can not be avoided by making tardy appropriations vastly in excess of what would have sufficed to meet and perhaps to ward off the danger.

Hayne Davis, president North Carolina Peace Society; James Sprunt, honorary president North Carolina Peace Society; Wm. F. Robertson, vice-president North Carolina Peace Society, captain Wilmington Light Infantry; Thos. H. Wright, secretary and treasurer North Carolina Peace Society; Louis Goodman, auditor North Carolina Peace Society; Wm. E. Springer, mayor of Wilmington, N. C.; J. A. Taylor, president Wilmington Chamber of Commerce; Walter Clark, chief justice of North Carolina; Francis D. Winston, lieutenant-governor; J. Bryan Grimes, secretary of state; James Iredell Johnson, mayor of Raleigh; A. H. Eller, former State senator; R. H. Battle; Fred A. Olds; Herbert W. Jackson; John Carri Springer; B. G. Worth; C. Van Leuven; Joseph H. Waters; T. R. Orrell; Alex S. Heide; W. H. Chadbourn; Thomas D. Meares; Rev. W. A. Snyder, pastor St. Paul's Lutheran Church; Rev. Fred D. Hale, pastor First Baptist Church; W. B. Cooper; D. L. Gore; W. M. Cumming; R. C. de Rossett; W. A. French, jr., member city council; Margaret Lovell Gibson, historian North Carolina Peace Society, and president North Carolina Federation of Woman's Clubs; Geo. Honnett, jr.; P. C. Graham, mayor of Durham; L. J. Brandt, mayor of Greensboro; E. J. Justice, speaker of North Carolina house of representatives; Charles E. Johnson, president Raleigh Chamber of Commerce; J. S. Manning; Julian S. Carr; George T. Winston; Ed Chambers Smith; Marshall de Lancy Haywood; Josephus Daniels; Johnston Pettigrew Chapter United Daughters of the Confederacy.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this memorial is signed, as will be seen by the officers of the North Carolina Peace Society and by a number of distinguished gentlemen of that State, by the chief justice of the supreme court, distinguished editors, and others, which therefore entitles it to respectful consideration. To those who may not have caught the drift of the memorial I may say that it dwells upon the question of national armament and international arbitration and states that the construction and maintenance of an adequate navy is not inconsistent with the purpose of the North Carolina Peace Society or with its parent, the International Peace Congress. This, I confess, is somewhat of a novel idea to me, that a peace society should at the same time encourage the increase of naval armament. But there are strong reasons urged in a letter addressed to me by the president of the State peace society, which I shall incorporate in my remarks and which is as follows:

THE NORTH CAROLINA PEACE SOCIETY,
Raleigh, N. C., March 15, 1908.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: It gives me pleasure to hand you, as the honorary president of our society, having a seat in the House of Representatives, the accompanying memorial in favor of the naval programme submitted to Congress by the President and also of a commission to investigate thoroughly the question of national security and international peace and justice, through armament, arbitration, or otherwise.

The reasons for this memorial will suggest themselves, but I venture to emphasize a few of the principal motives that prompted its preparation.

Some of the organizations that have the cause of international peace and justice at heart feel it a duty to obstruct the way of their National Government in endeavoring to make such preparations for war as existing conditions seem to demand. This is true not only in Europe but to an increasing degree in America, and this fact compels some of those who take pleasure in advocating arbitration as a means of peace and justice to come out in support of the Government in its efforts to provide adequate armament pending the effective establishment of arbitration as an actual and reliable system.

The apparent inconsistency in advocating both armament and arbitration disappears after even a casual analysis of these means of justice in their relation to each other and to national security and to international peace.

The North Carolina Peace Society has declared itself for adequate armament and effective arbitration, on the ground that it is the duty of American citizens, individually and collectively, to support the Government in both of these means of protecting the nation's rights in its relations with other powers.

Greatly as we regret the necessity of making any preparation for war, we recognize that the United States is in duty bound to maintain such an armed force on land and sea as will enable the nation to protect each of the States in the full, free, and perpetual exercise of all the rights reserved under the Constitution, to preserve, unimpaired, all the national rights and interests, and to execute a just policy in our foreign affairs.

Such preparation is the penalty we must pay for the condition of affairs which confronts the nation. Not to make this preparation would correspond to permitting your gas plant and fixtures to fall into bad repair as soon as you decide there is a better system for lighting and before you have installed such a system. Such action would be not only unwise but very dangerous. On the other hand, making proper preparation for emergencies, which may arise before we can install a reliable system of international arbitration, would help rather than hinder the prosecution of this necessary and laudable work. It will tend to preserve a temporary peace until the things that pertain to a permanent peace can be ascertained and put into effective operation the world over.

Without claiming to be acquainted with all the highly technical and complicated questions involved in a proper determination of whether the Navy now needs two, four, or four times four battle ships of the first class, we are convinced that, upon principle, every nation should have an unquestionably superior force in its own territory and in the waters adjacent to its possessions, provided the national resources make this possible; also that no pains should be spared, even by the most powerfully armed nation, to perfect as rapidly as possible a complete system of international law as a substitute for war in the international realm.

Inasmuch as facts, not personal opinions or preferences, determine what is adequate armament for any particular country and what is effective arbitration, the North Carolina Peace Society believes that the ships asked for by the President and by the Navy Department should be provided by Congress and that a commission should be appointed to investigate thoroughly the whole question of national security and international justice, in the light of what was done and what was left undone by the Second Hague Conference, and in the light of the events that caused the transfer of our entire navy power to the Pacific Ocean, and of such other facts, including the attitude of other governments to our vital interests, as may have a bearing upon the proper determination of a scientific naval policy for our country.

In proposing such a commission our society does not mean to reflect upon the competence of the members of the Naval Committees of the Senate and House or upon Congress. On the contrary, the innumerable duties devolving upon the Members of Congress call for a scientific and thorough investigation at this time of these two questions, so vital to the prosperity of our people and the peace of the world, by persons having the same ability and patriotism as the Members of Congress, but freed from the engrossing cares of office, which prevent even the most conscientious Members of Congress from giving to these questions the attention which their importance makes proper and which their complexity makes necessary.

Such a commission would seem to be incomplete unless it contains a representative of the Army and Navy, as well as a member of the Second Hague Conference and the Third Pan-American Conference. The addition of a member of the Senate and also of the House of Representatives would undoubtedly be of great service, on account of their experience in our National Legislature, upon which the responsibility of right decision must finally fall.

You will of course know what weight should be given to this memorial and whether it merits the attention of the House. It occurs to us that the Speaker will not be averse in such case to permitting the House to hear this memorial from his native State, though his impartiality in the conduct of the high office which he holds would prevent his giving it any consideration which its contents do not entitle it to. It contains names interwoven with the best endeavors of our State in the present and in the past, and I sincerely believe that it can be regarded as the sense of the representative people of North Carolina, who would be glad of an opportunity, in my judgment, to join with the signers in presenting it to Congress. The near approach of the time for final action on the Naval Committees' report prevents our giving them this opportunity.

Copies of this memorial and letter have been sent to Senator OVERMAN and to each of the North Carolina Members of the House, and they will no doubt be glad to cooperate with you in taking such action upon it as your judgment and their wishes may indicate as proper and expedient.

Assured of your cooperation in all ways proper to effectuate these ideas, and with best wishes, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

HAYNE DAVIS, President.

I wish to say that I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, in submitting this memorial or any remarks I may make, to indicate the position of the delegation from North Carolina in this House. Speaking for myself, I may say that I shall not vote for four battle ships as I am at present advised, but vote for a maximum of two battle ships, which number, as I understand, will be recommended by the Naval Committee.

The distinguished names appended to this memorial and the proposition they submit are of sufficient importance, in my judgment, to submit to the House and to be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHANEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the pension appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. STEPHENS of Texas to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of W. J. Chrisman, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

To Mr. GARDNER of Michigan to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Frank D. Newberry, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the SPEAKER signed the same:

H. R. 17311. An act to authorize the Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a bridge over and across the Mobile River and its navigable channels on a line approximately east of the north boundary line of the city of Mobile, Ala.

COMMITTEE RESIGNATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, March 16, 1908.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Assuring you of my appreciation of your kindness in appointing me upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

I am, with greatest respect,

Yours, truly, J. T. WATKINS.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to relieving the gentleman from Louisiana from further service on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4049. An act authorizing a credit in certain accounts of the Treasurer of the United States; and

S. 624. An act providing for the appointment of an appraiser of merchandise for the customs collection district of Puget Sound, State of Washington.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. BAILEY and Mr. GALLINGER members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, late a Senator from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator, and that, as a further mark of respect to his memory, the Senate do now adjourn.

DEATH OF SENATOR WHYTE.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Speaker, it is with more than profound sorrow that I rise to call the attention of the House of Representatives to the resolution of the Senate which has just been read, announcing the death of the late Senator from Maryland, Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, and to ask the House to adopt the resolutions which I shall presently send to the Speaker's desk. Mr. Speaker, Senator WHYTE believed in the simple life. He lived the simple life, and at his death or just prior thereto he requested that the funeral services should be of the most simple character. In accordance with that request we have omitted from the resolutions which we shall ask the House to pass the usual appointment of a Congressional committee to attend the funeral.

This, Mr. Speaker, is not the time to express our feelings as to our loss nor to speak of his life and his great public services. Some time later I shall ask that a day be set apart for that purpose. I present the following resolutions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were agreed to.

Accordingly, in pursuance of the foregoing resolutions (at 4 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a statement of the French spoliation cases dismissed April 22, 1907, on motion of defendants, for want of prosecution—to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Shelby Grisham, administrator of estate of Daniel Thompson, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Dan Thomason, administrator of estate of Joel Harrell, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of R. M. Rogan, administrator of estate of F. S. Heiskell, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the schooner Centurion, Philip Greely, master—to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Samuel E. Fitzhugh, administrator of estate of Samuel H. Fitzhugh, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 19, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIAN ROLLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, by direction of the President and in response to a resolution of January 15, 1908, a list of the rolls of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians now in the possession of the Auditor for the Department of the Interior, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF CHICKASAW FUNDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting by direction of the President, and in response to a resolution of the 3d instant, a report with reference to certain indictments formerly found against D. H. Johnston, P. S. Mosely, George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish, and later dismissed, in the matter of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of cases filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims and dismissed April 22, 1907, by the court on motion of the defendants for want of prosecution, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the findings of fact and conclusions of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the vessel schooner Centurian, Philip Greeley, master, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact filed by the court in the following causes:

In the cause of Adelaide L. Spall, administratrix of George Sands, deceased, v. United States; and

In the cause of Barbara A. Melville, administratrix de bonis non, cum testamento anexo of William Shreve, deceased, v. United States.

The foregoing findings were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

S. 4377. An act to carry into effect the international convention of December 21, 1904, relating to the exemption in time of war of hospital ships from dues and taxes on vessels; and

S. R. 58. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to establish harbor lines in Wilmington Harbor, California.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 10540. An act to amend section 73 of the act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii;

H. R. 13448. An act to authorize the counties of Allegheny and Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, to change the site of the joint county bridge which now crosses the Monongahela River at Monongahela City, Pa., and to construct a new bridge across said river in the place of said present bridge upon a new site;

H. R. 16743. An act for the removal of the restrictions on alienation of lands of allottees of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., and the sale of all tribal lands, school, agency, or other buildings on any of the reservations within the jurisdiction of such agency, and for other purposes;

H. R. 17301. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease allotted or unallotted Indian lands for mining purposes;

H. R. 17707. An act to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River, in Stone County, Mo., and divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again to create electric power;

H. R. 17710. An act to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service of the United States;

H. R. 17983. An act for completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol;

H. R. 18689. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze cannon and cannon balls to the city of Winchester, Va.; and

H. J. Res. 124. Joint resolution authorizing the presentation of the statue of President Washington, now located in the Capitol grounds, to the Smithsonian Institution.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MARSHALL, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions of the House on the death of Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, late a Senator from the State of Maryland.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

H. R. 16143. An act to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands; and

H. R. 17311. An act to authorize the Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a bridge over and across the Mobile River and its navigable channels on a line approximately east of the north boundary line of the city of Mobile, Ala.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of Local Union No. 286, International Typographical Union, of Marion, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to relieve trades unions from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Chicago, Ill., and a memorial of the Irish League of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the ratification of the pending treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Indiana and Ohio conference of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of the National Association of Clothiers, of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Aldrich currency bill" and praying for the passage of the so-called "Fowler currency bill," which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 804, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers, of Marion, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Penrose bill," to exclude nonmailable periodicals from second-class mail privileges, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLATT presented a memorial of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Aldrich currency bill," which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York, March 11, 1908.

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, urgently but respectfully request that Senate bill No. 3023, entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," introduced by Senator ALDRICH, be not passed, for the reasons set forth in the following report of the board's committee on finance and taxation, which was unanimously adopted at the monthly meeting of the board held this day:

At a meeting of the finance committee held on Wednesday, the 4th instant, thoughtful consideration was given to United States Senate bill No. 3023, entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," introduced by Senator ALDRICH.

This bill provides for an emergency currency to be secured by United States, State, county, municipal, and high-grade railroad bonds, to be issued only in times of emergency. To be specific, the objectionable features of the bill are:

First. Its passage would postpone for an indefinite time further serious consideration of currency reform.

Second. It would add one more unwise provision to our already defective banking system, viz, the inducement it offers to banks to invest in railroad, State, county, and municipal bonds.

Third. Under the provisions of the bill the cost of taking out currency and putting it in circulation would be so heavy that the bill would probably be inoperative.

It is the judgment of your committee that the passage of this bill should be opposed by this association on the general ground that it would bring no benefit whatever to our defective currency system, but, on the contrary, would probably introduce an element of weakness into our banking situation.

Conservative bankers agree that investment in bonds by commercial banks is not in the line of good banking, and that no emergency currency measure should be adopted that would encourage banks to buy bonds for future use or that will make necessary the purchase of bonds in an emergency in order to obtain a currency supply. Everything a bank owes is payable on demand, and its assets at all times should be kept in the most liquid state possible.

The experience of banks in commercial centers, especially in reserve cities and more especially in New York, is that once or twice each year there arises a condition in the money market which makes it almost impossible for them to maintain their lawful money reserve, and as a necessary precaution conservative bankers, in midwinter, when harvest money returns, buy short-time paper, maturing in the spring, and in the summer, when money is plentiful, paper maturing in the early autumn. The maturity of this paper enables them to augment their reserves during those seasons of the year when the pressure for money is the greatest, while any bond investment or other form of long-time investment would make it difficult, if not impossible, at such times for them to easily maintain their lawful money reserve.

If bank assets were kept in such liquid form that at all seasons of the year, without difficulty, they could maintain their proper reserve, the necessity for an emergency currency would seldom arise.

The provisions of the bill would probably never be availed of except in the direst extremity. For stringency in crop-moving periods they would, in our judgment, be inoperative.

The purchase of bonds, with its attendant risk of loss, the tax of 6 per cent, the locking up of probably from 15 to 25 per cent of the cost of the bonds, would make the interest charge on the currency received so high that no banker could be induced to take it out. Even in the face of approaching panic bankers would hesitate to pay so high a rate for money.

The risk of loss involved in the purchase of bonds for emergency purposes would be great, especially if bought during a panic, when speculative prices prevail. If a 2 per cent United States bond as security for circulation should be worth from 105 to 110 in time of panic, what would a 4 per cent municipal bond or a 4 or 5 per cent railroad bond be worth for the same purpose? And what would the same bonds be worth after the panic subsides, when the bonds were no longer in demand? Commercial bankers who have in the past invested to any great extent in railroad and municipal bonds will generally agree that the loss on such investments covering any ten-year period has been much greater than on commercial paper and that their bond investments in times of money pressure has made it very difficult for them to accommodate their commercial customers.

The purchase of bonds during an emergency as security for circulation would weaken the cash condition of banks unless at the same time they were using clearing-house loan certificates in settlement of balances between themselves, for the money required to purchase the bonds would be one-third greater than the amount of relief obtained, and would have to be paid for in lawful money through the clearing house.

For these reasons your committee recommend that the New York Board of Trade and Transportation enter its protest against the passage by Congress of the bill presented by Senator ALDRICH and that the committee on finance be authorized to take such steps as in its judgment seem wise to oppose the enactment of such law.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. PLATT presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, Thursday, February 20, 1908.

By Mr. Davis. Concurrent resolution of the senate and assembly of the State of New York, requesting the Senators and Representatives of New York in the Congress of the United States of America to aid in the enactment of a law to create a volunteer retired list, upon which surviving officers of the United States Volunteer Army, Navy, and Marines of the civil war may be placed with retired pay.

Whereas it has been the policy of this country from the beginning to retain a small Regular Army, and in times of war to rely upon the patriotism of the people to rally as volunteers in defense of the national flag; and

Whereas it is a recognized fact that the civil war—1861 to 1865—forms the most sanguinary chapter in the history of the world; that the Regular Army, during that struggle, was maintained at about 25,000 officers and men, while the volunteers numbered more than 2,500,000 of officers and enlisted men; and

Whereas it is a recognized fact that the union of these States was preserved, and the national authority maintained by the patriotism, fortitude, and valor of the volunteers, to whom this great united people, now enjoying the inestimable blessings of a preserved Union, owe a debt of gratitude that can never be paid: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That we request the Senators and Representatives of the Sixtieth Congress from the State of New York to aid in the prompt enactment of a law in effect creating a volunteer retired list, upon which may be placed with retired pay, upon application, the surviving volunteer officers of the Army, Navy, and Marines of the United States who served with credit during the civil war; such survivors now constituting a small remnant of that body of gallant men who led the Union forces to final victory: Be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That in our opinion the precedents of Congressional legislation fully justify the enactment of this law, namely, the acts of 1828 and 1832, granting retired pay during life to the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marines of the Revolution; the act of 1901 retiring Charles A. Boutelle, a volunteer officer of the Union Navy, with the rank and retired pay of captain of the Navy; the acts of 1904, 1906, and 1907 granting increased rank and retired pay to the officers of the Regular Army and Navy, based solely on the ground that they had "served with credit during the civil war;" and the act of 1905 providing for the retirement of two officers of volunteers, namely, Generals Joseph R. Hawley and P. J. Osterhaus, with the rank and retired pay of brigadier-generals: Be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That in our opinion the surviving officers of volunteers of the Army, Navy, and Marines, who served with credit in the great war for the preservation of the Union, are entitled to receive from the National Government honors and emoluments equal to those which had heretofore been bestowed upon any officers who have served in time of war in defense of the country.

By order of the senate.

LAFAYETTE B. GLEASON, Clerk.

In assembly March 11, 1908. Concurred in without amendment.
By order of the assembly.

RAY B. SMITH, Clerk.

Mr. LONG presented a memorial of Witter & McKee, of Havensville, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Alton, Anthony, Burlington, Colony, Fall River, Florence, Fort Dodge, Louisburg, Norcatur, and Richmond, all in the State of Kansas; of Clarksburg, Eldon, Garden City, Garrison, Gentry, Ironton, Kimmswick, Lockwood Mansfield, Mooreville, Nevada, Neosho, New Haven, Newburg, Reno, Sedalia, St. Joseph, St. Louis, Trenton, and Webster Grove, all in the State of Missouri; of Gorham, Me.; Soldiers' Home and Watrousville, in the State of Michigan; of Killbuck, Ohio; Luray, S. C., and of Seattle, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to protect the first day of the week as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM presented a resolution of the city council of Dixon, Ill., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the construction of the Hennepin Canal was undertaken for the purpose, among other things, of enabling the citizens of northern Illinois to have access by a water route to the Mississippi River and its tributaries and to the Great Lakes; and

Whereas said canal has now been completed and is ready for use for the purposes of navigation; and

Whereas the expenditure of but a small amount of money in dredging and deepening of a portion of Rock River at and below the city of Dixon will give to said city of Dixon all of the benefits accruing from said canal: Therefore be it

Resolved by the city council of the city of Dixon:

SECTION 1. That the Senators from the State of Illinois and the Member of Congress from this Congressional district be, and they are hereby, requested to use their efforts to the end that the Congress at its present session shall make an appropriation to be expended in the dredging and deepening of Rock River at and below the city of Dixon to a sufficient depth to make the same navigable.

SEC. 2. That copies of this resolution be sent by the city clerk of this city to the Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM and the Hon. ALBERT J. HOPKINS, Senators from Illinois, and to the Hon. FRANK O. LOWDEN, Member of Congress from the Thirteenth Congressional District of Illinois.

BLAKE GROVER, City Clerk.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of J. T. Harahan Division, No. 602, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Champaign, Ill., and a petition of Moreshade Lodge, No. 706, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of East St. Louis, Ill., praying for the passage of the so-called "La Follette-Sterling employers' liability bill," which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Montgomery Club, of Unionville, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the pending treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of John Buford Post, No. 243, Department of Illinois, Grand Army of the Republic, of Rock Island, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation proposing to abolish certain pension agencies throughout the country, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the city council of Galena, Ill., praying that an appropriation be made for the opening of a channel of 6 feet in depth in the Mississippi River from St. Louis, Mo., to Minneapolis, Minn., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MARTIN presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution in regard to naval coast-defense board.

Whereas the entrance to Chesapeake Bay is commercially and strategically of the very first importance, which fact has been fully recognized by the military authorities of the United States, so that the naval coast-defense board has repeatedly emphasized the necessity of securing this entrance against outside fleets, which, should it gain control of the sea, could establish, without coming under the fire of a single gun, a base on the shores of Virginia and have access to large quantities of valuable supplies of all kinds, thus paralyzing the vast commercial and industrial business in and around Chesapeake Bay; and

Whereas there is contained in the fortifications bill now pending before the Congress of the United States provision for the acquisition and fortification of the entrance to Chesapeake Bay: Be it

Resolved by the house of delegates (the senate concurring), That the United States Senators from Virginia are directed, and the Members of Congress from Virginia are requested, to use every effort to secure the necessary appropriations from the Congress, recommended in the fortifications bill, to enable the necessary, proper, and adequate protection and defense for the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each United States Senator and Member of Congress from Virginia by John W. Williams, keeper of the rolls of Virginia.

Agreed to by the house of delegates, January 29, 1908.

Agreed to by the senate, February 1, 1908.

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,
Keeper of the Rolls of Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution to distribute the surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the several States for the purpose of improving roads therein.

Whereas the question of improving the roads of the State is one in which our people are deeply interested, and realizing that the best solution of the question can only be reached by national aid, in addition to local and State aid: Be it

Resolved by the house of delegates of Virginia (the senate concurring), That our Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to support and, if possible, secure the passage of a bill introduced by Hon. H. D. FLOOD, known as H. R. 164, entitled "A bill to distribute the surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia for the sole purpose of improving the roads therein."

The keeper of the rolls will send a copy of this resolution to each of the Senators and Members of Congress.

Agreed to by the general assembly of Virginia, February 4, 1908.

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,
Keeper of the Rolls of Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution to oppose in every possible manner the influx into Virginia of immigrants from Southern Europe.

Resolved by the senate of Virginia (the house of delegates concurring), That our Representatives in both Houses of Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to oppose in every possible manner the influx into Virginia of immigrants from Southern Europe, with their Mafia and Black Hand and murder societies, and with no characteristics to make them with us a homogeneous people, believing, as we do, that upon Anglo-Saxon supremacy depend the future welfare and prosperity of this Commonwealth; and we view with alarm any effort that may tend to corrupt its citizenship.

Agreed to by general assembly of Virginia, February 14, 1908.

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,
Clerk, House of Delegates, and Keeper of the Records of Virginia.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $700,000 to enable the Secretary of the Navy to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500,000 to be expended by the Postmaster-General in improving the condition of the roads over which rural-delivery routes are to be established, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment providing that all public lands, reserved and unreserved, of the United States, now unsurveyed within the States of Idaho, Oregon, Montana, and California shall be surveyed without regard to settlement thereon, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DICK submitted an amendment providing that payments of increase of pay for foreign service which have heretofore been made to officers and enlisted men of the Army serving on Army transports in the Philippine Islands shall be allowed by the accounting officers in the settlement of their accounts, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment providing for the establishment of a weather bureau station at Miami, Fla., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. ELKINS submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. FOSTER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE COPYRIGHT LAWS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate, in conjunction with the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives, all matters pertaining to the copyright laws; to send for persons and papers; to administer oaths; and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with such investigation and have the same printed for its use; that the committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and that all expenses of such investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5254) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors, which was, on page 2, to strike out lines 23 to 26, inclusive.

Mr. SCOTT. Owing to the death of the beneficiary, after the bill passed the Senate, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATORS FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, as it will be convenient to myself and my colleagues, I desire to give notice that on Saturday, April 11, immediately after the routine morning business is disposed of, I shall ask the Senate to pause long enough to pay tribute to our distinguished predecessors, Mr. Morgan and Mr. Pettus, late Senators from Alabama.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. LATTA, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On March 16, 1908:

S. 1931. An act to grant certain land, part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Valentine for a site for a reservoir or tank to hold water to supply the public of said village; and

S. 2948. An act to provide additional station grounds and terminal facilities for the Arizona and California Railway Company, in the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 10540. An act to amend section 73 of the act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 13448. An act to authorize the counties of Allegheny and Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, to change the site of the joint county bridge which now crosses the Monongahela River at Monongahela City, Pa., and to construct a new bridge across said river in the place of said present bridge upon a new site; and

H. R. 17707. An act to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River, in Stone County, Mo., and divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again to create electric power.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

H. R. 16743. An act for the removal of the restrictions on alienation of lands of allottees of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., and the sale of all tribal lands, school, agency, or other buildings on any of the reservations within the jurisdiction of such agency, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 17301. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease allotted or unallotted Indian lands for mining purposes.

H. R. 17983. An act for completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

H. R. 18689. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze cannon and cannon balls to the city of Winchester, Va., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. J. Res. 124. Joint resolution authorizing the presentation of the statue of President Washington now located in the Capitol grounds to the Smithsonian Institution, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of making a brief statement.

I had expected that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would be present this morning and proceed at once to finish his speech. I understand that he will not be here before 2 o'clock, but will be here at that time and desires to proceed. I shall not bring up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill at this time, preferring to withhold it until after his remarks are completed. I yield to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] to bring up his omnibus claims bill.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. FULTON. I ask that the bill (H. R. 15372) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, commonly known as the "Bowman and Tucker acts," be now taken up and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

Mr. FULTON. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, before beginning the reading of the bill, I desire to make a few statements explanatory of the rules that have been adopted in preparing this measure.

As the bill came from the House it carried appropriations aggregating $315,345.28. It now carries $2,299,601.82. This aggregate amount is made up of what has been classified in the bill as "Miscellaneous Court of Claims findings under the Bowman and Tucker acts," $985,747.12. All these claims are based on Court of Claims findings. They are either for the use and occupation of buildings and real estate or for stores and supplies taken for the use of the Army.

In preparing the bill the committee has followed in a general way these rules: First, they have not included any item where the court has affirmatively found that there has been laches in presenting the claim and that no excuse has been offered for the negligence or failure of the claimant to present it within the proper time.

In the matter of claims for the use and occupation of real estate, the committee have not allowed any claims where the value of the buildings was found when the buildings had been destroyed. A great many Senators whose constituents have claims of this character have felt that the rule of the committee was unjust in that particular. Where the finding was that a certain building had been used by the Army for a given period of time and then destroyed by the Army or torn down and the materials used, the court found the value of the building, but did not find the value of the materials that were used by the Army. The contention is that the claim should be allowed for the value of the building. The rule the committee have followed is simply to allow claims that were for such things as the Army actually used, which the Army otherwise would have had to purchase. Of course, in a case of that kind, if a building was torn down and the material taken and used by the Army, the only benefit the Army got was from the material, and we allow the value of the material.

On the ground of laches——

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator whether the bill as originally reported to the Senate, which was afterwards recommitted to the Committee on Claims, is still in print? The bill as it originally came from the Committee on Claims included certain items which are not included in this bill, and in order to reach those items it will be necessary to have the first print. I have been unable to secure a copy of the bill as it originally came from the Committee on Claims of the Senate.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator can find it in the document room.

Mr. CLAY. I have not been able to do so.

Mr. FULTON. I am told that copies are there. It is in print.

When the committee first reported the bill in the amended form it carried a number of claims that were not properly there under the rules I have stated. The report and bill were re-referred to the committee and those claims were eliminated.

I realize, Mr. President, that constituents of Senators who are interested in these claims have been misled. Claims appeared in the first print, and of course they assumed that the claim was allowed by the committee. They were eliminated in the second print, and it has led to misunderstanding on the part of their constituents. As far as I am concerned, I will state that I am perfectly willing that those claims which were reported in the print of the first report may be reinserted in this bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in this connection I will call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to a fact, to which he will recollect I called his attention, where there is a mistake in the first print in the case of St. Philip's Episcopal Church, Atlanta, and the sum was nineteen hundred instead of $800.

Mr. FULTON. I think that is corrected in the second print.

Mr. BACON. Possibly.

Mr. FULTON. With this statement, Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to proceed with the reading.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I observe that we are to proceed in the usual way, and the Senator has asked for the consideration of the committee amendments. There are some places where an initial is wrong or a name is wrong. I think it would be easier to correct that as we go along. I ask the Senator if it would embarrass him if I should call his attention to such defects as the reading proceeds?

Mr. FULTON. Not at all. Indeed, I would be very glad to have any Senator do that, because there may be some defects of that character in the print, which should be corrected as the bill is read.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. FRAZIER. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator was making his statement with reference to the second report, brought in in the way of correction of the first report. Did I understand the Senator to indicate his willingness as chairman of the committee to accept and have placed in the bill, as now being considered, those claims that were left out of the original print?

Mr. FULTON. I so stated, because I think that the claimants have been misled, and their claims having appeared in the first print, it would hardly be just to the Senators representing those States to decline to pay them. I think, indeed I know, that the claims are in violation of the rule the committee has established. Of course I do not know that that rule would receive the approval of the Senate, but I think it is a correct rule and a just rule.

I wish to make a further statement, however, in this connection. I think it is a wrong policy that has been followed in the past of sending these bills, at least in such large numbers, to the Court of Claims. Indeed, I have reached the conclusion, from the study I have given the subject as chairman of the Committee on Claims, that section 14 of the Tucker Act should be repealed and no more of this character of claims should be sent to that court. When I say claims of this character, I mean what we commonly call "war claims."

We have now come so far away from that period that it is almost impossible to get reliable testimony touching transactions that occurred during the war days. These bills go down to the Court of Claims. The Government is entirely helpless, because it is a practical impossibility for it to discover any witnesses who were familiar with the transactions. As to these claimants, I am not charging them with wholesale fraud, but the opportunity to perpetrate wholesale fraud on the Government is provided by this method of proceeding, and I have no doubt a vast number of these claims are in truth absolutely without any just and substantial foundation; but they go to the court. The court is bound by the testimony the claimant produces. The Government is helpless to produce any. The court is compelled to find that so much property was taken for the use of the Army, and that the claimant was loyal. The claims come back here, and there seems to be nothing left for Congress, or for the committee that has it in charge, at least, to do but to report the bill favorably, because they are favorable on their face on the finding of the court.

I was going to say it seems there is nothing left for Congress to do but to provide for their payment, but in view of the fact that so many years have passed since these transactions occurred, I think the practice of sending these claims to the Court of Claims should be discontinued. Therefore, before the pending bill is disposed of I propose to offer an amendment repealing section 14 of the Tucker Act. If that shall be adopted, there will be no provision of law for sending claims to the Court of Claims for findings of fact except under the Bowman Act, which does not give the court further jurisdiction of claims of this character. I shall offer the amendment, however, on my own responsibility. The committee has not approved it. Indeed, the question has not been presented to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, if I understood him properly in answering the question of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER]. He stated that he, as chairman of the committee, is perfectly willing that the claims that were rejected on the first print, and not appearing in the second print, should be reinstated in the pending bill, and that he thought they ought to be paid.

Mr. FULTON. I stated as chairman of the committee that I am willing, as far as I am concerned, that they may be reinstated. As to whether they ought to be paid is another proposition. I think most of those claims were eliminated on the ground of laches. So far as the defense of the statute of limitations is concerned, as a rule I do not have very much sympathy with it, but in a case of this kind, where the facts depend upon a transaction that occurred so many years ago—where there is no record of it—I think that the Government is justified in asserting its defense of the statute of limitations and availing itself of laches. But it is quite likely, in fact I think entirely likely, that these claims where laches have been found are in the majority as just and as equitable demands against the Government as those where laches have not been found.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that as far as I am concerned I think it would be a very dangerous step to take. If we adopt that as a precedent and such claims are paid, I do not know where on earth it would end. I can not say how many items would be added to this bill in the House similar to those which were included in the first print. The Committee on Claims strictly mapped out the rules, and they were followed, and this would be a violation of those rules.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I do not know how it is with claims from other States, but I will say to the Senator that the claims relating to the four churches in Georgia were not stricken out on account of negligence or laches. The judgments were rendered in each case by the Court of Claims for the value of those churches, fixing their value, and the items were inserted in the first print of the bill. The bill was afterwards reconsidered and recommitted to the Committee on Claims, and those items were dropped out simply because they included the total value of the churches and improvements instead of only the material used, when they did not prove the value of each item of material. Where a church is proven to have been worth $400 and was entirely taken, then they refuse to pay that claim. To pay a claim where the item of lumber amounted to $400 is, in my judgment, absurd.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator from Utah will allow me right there?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator from Georgia takes the wrong view of this proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. FULTON. The only thing for which the Government should be liable is that which was used by the Army. The destruction of property by an army in war time——

Mr. CLAY. That does not apply to a single one of these cases.

Mr. FULTON. There is no government in the world that pays for property destroyed by an army. The only thing for which the Government does pay is for the property used by the Army.

Mr. CLAY. The items to which I have reference I have proven were taken and used by the Army. They were taken and used for the purpose of building bridges.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we are perfectly willing to pay for property that was taken by the Army and used for the purpose of building bridges, but we do not want the Government to pay any more for the lumber that went into the bridges than the lumber was worth in the construction of the building.

Mr. CLAY. Then, if the Senator from Utah refers these claims to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims is authorized to fix the value of this material, how are we going to test the judgment of the court?

Mr. SMOOT. The Court of Claims fixes the value of the building, not of the material, and that is what we want to pay for—the material and its value, instead of the value of the building.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the chairman of the committee—and we ought to have a distinct understanding since this bill has been taken up—to agree that these items should be restored.

Mr. FULTON. I have.

Mr. SMOOT. The chairman has agreed.

Mr. FULTON. Let me say, if the Senator from Utah will allow me——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. So far as I am concerned I agree to it; I believe it should be done under the circumstances; and yet, of course, in the last analysis it is for the Senate to say whether or not it shall be done. It is not for me.

Mr. CLAY. As I understand the Senator from Oregon, then, heretofore the practice of the Senate has been, where a bill came from a great committee in regard to an item of this kind, to accept whatever the chairman of the committee, representing the committee, proposed to do. Do I understand from the Senator from Oregon that he is willing to accept these amendments, and under the arrangement the other members of the committee are to fight the amendments? Is that the rule that we are to adopt in this case?

Mr. FULTON. Does the Senator ask me if I have such an arrangement with the other members of the committee?

Mr. CLAY. I ask if the Senator from Utah is on the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, sir; I am on the committee.

Mr. FULTON. Does the Senator from Georgia suppose that I would stand here and make that statement——

Mr. CLAY. I do not think so.

Mr. FULTON. With a secret understanding——

Mr. CLAY. I did not say that.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee, I have felt that under the rule which we adopted as a committee—and under that rule the pending bill was reported—we could not pay such claims as the ones which are advocated by the Senator from Georgia. It is not for me to say, except so far as I am personally concerned, that, if those claims are paid, then every claim similar to the claims from Georgia should be paid.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I notice what the chairman of the Committee on Claims has said, that we can not pay for these churches, but may pay for the lumber which they contained.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly my position.

Mr. TELLER. Let me get through, if I am not taking the time of the Senator from Utah. If I am, I shall wait until he gets through.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have had a good deal of experience with the Committee on Claims. I was its chairman for a great many years, and a member of it, I think, for at least a third of the time I have been in the Senate. I can, if I am given the time, produce an abundance of evidence to show that the Senate has never adopted the rule stated by the Senator from Utah, but has always taken the position in the case of the destruction of a schoolhouse, a college, or a church, that the Government will pay for the building—will pay for the damage the institution has suffered. If the Committee on Claims have made a different rule, the Senate has never adopted that rule. As has been suggested to me, we have paid for Masonic buildings, and we have paid for all variety of buildings of that character not what the building was worth, but what it would cost to replace the building.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. That, I think, Mr. President, is a rule which becomes this great nation. When it attempts to make any payment of that kind, it should make the party whole, especially when it is a public institution either of learning or of religion. Such was, at least, for fifteen years of this Senate's history the rule, and if there has been any different rule adopted I have never heard of it.

Mr. FULTON obtained the floor.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. FULTON. I will yield first to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who wishes to ask a question, and then I will yield to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] if he has ever differentiated between the mere destruction of a building by the Army and the destruction of a building for the purpose of obtaining the material in it?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I never went into that question. The question was, Was this building destroyed? If it was a church, was it destroyed? If it was a college, was it destroyed?

The former Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, made a very elaborate speech here upon that question originally, and we adopted his ideas. We paid for the school and the college buildings and the churches from that time on, as long as I had any connection with the Committee on Claims. I should think such a course as is now proposed would be disgraceful to this great nation of ours. Here is a church which has been pulled down and its material put into a bridge, perhaps, and now we say to these claimants, "You must come here and prove how much lumber was in your church."

Mr. President, no self-respecting nation would think of doing a thing of that kind. We are not obliged by the laws of war to pay for a church. Our Army can destroy a church if they choose and the laws of nations do not require us to pay for it. But we adopted a different rule, a rule consonant with our position at the end of a great war like that which closed in 1865. We said we did not make war upon institutions of that kind and that losses of that kind should be repaid. That was notably the case, Mr. President, as to William and Mary College. That was the case which Senator Hoar took up. There had been at least two or three reports against that claim. Senator Hoar took up the case, he then being a member of the Committee on Claims, presented it to the Senate, and carried it through. That case has been a precedent, so long as I was a member of the committee, for the action of the committee.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, there might be many reasons that would appeal to the Senate to pay for damage to William and Mary College and various other institutions of which I can think that would not apply in other cases, nor would the Senate wish to adopt them as the basis of a regular and invariable rule. In making up a bill of this character it is necessary to adopt some rule, to proceed along that line, and to adhere to it. I state again that we adopted a rule to pay only for that which the Army got and used and which was necessary to it. The destruction of property otherwise is nothing more than war. If we are to enter upon the policy of paying for everything that was destroyed during the war it will open up a mighty flood. But, of course, the Senators do not contend for that, I understand.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. Just a second. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] contends that we should pay for all of these buildings and that it has been the policy heretofore to do so. The Senator from Colorado, of course, is much better acquainted with the history of legislation and the practices of the Senate than I am——

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. FULTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN. I would not interrupt the Senator, except that I am anxious to say something about these church claims before he goes on to any other matter.

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, if I understand the precedents in the Senate and the principles that have actuated the Senate, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has stated them correctly. We all realize that the Government does not pay damages resulting from acts of war or from the wanton acts of soldiers, even though those damages be inflicted upon loyal citizens, but in relation to church property, to the property of benevolent associations, religious associations, and educational institutions a different rule has obtained. Under the broad and enlightened leadership of the former Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, Congress did pay for damages done to William and Mary College, at Williamsburg, Va., and in advocating the payment of that claim the Senator from Massachusetts laid down the broad and enlightened principle which I have just stated, that in time of war among civilized people church property, educational property, and the property of eleemosynary institutions should be held sacred and inviolate, and if the necessities of war or the exigencies of war led to the destruction of property of that kind a different rule should obtain than that applied in other cases, and that while payment might not be made to individuals, in regard to other classes of property full reparation should be made.

The first case under that principle, which was advanced, I say, so ably, so generously, and so justly by the great Senator from Massachusetts, was the case of William and Mary College, in my own State. Since that time, so far as I know, that precedent has in no case been overruled by a vote of the Senate. It is true that the committee has excluded from the pending bill not only churches that have been destroyed by act of war—and I think the committee made a grave mistake in so doing—but it has gone further and excluded from the bill church property taken for the use of the Army, although the Army needed and had to have the church property. I say it is neither just nor logical to say that, although the necessities of the service are such as to require the Army to take possession of a church and use it, still the Government must not pay for what is so taken and used, but only for the material in it after it has been pulled to pieces. It is a metaphysical difference; it is not, in my opinion, founded in justice or in logic or in right.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he is not familiar with the rule which has been adopted by the court in cases of this character? For instance, an apple tree is cut down and used for firewood. The court does not give to the claimant the value of that apple tree. It might be worth a hundred dollars, but the court gives to the claimant the value of the cord wood, whatever it may amount to.

Mr. MARTIN. Courts may do that in the Senator's State, but I hope never have done it nor will do it in mine.

Mr. FULTON. That is, I submit, a proper rule.

Mr. MARTIN. In my State if a trespasser goes into my orchard and destroys it, he has to pay the value of it as an orchard and not as cord wood.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator is talking about legal liability. That is one thing. What the Government does in the reparation of damages caused through war is another thing entirely.

Mr. MARTIN. But, Mr. President, in this case I am not applying the rules of law. The proposition before us is not restricted to the narrow limits of legal construction. It is a question of national policy and of humane warfare. I say that church property, educational property, and the property of eleemosynary institutions, when taken for Government use in time of war, ought to be paid for. The Senate has time and again acted on that principle, and I know of no reason why it should now depart from so just and so wise a policy. In this bill, however, the committee have not only eliminated claims for property destroyed, but they have gone further and eliminated cases where the claim was for a church taken for the use of the Army; and they have undertaken to differentiate and say that where the Army needed the church and the necessities of the service required that this sacred property should be invaded and appropriated, you must pay for it, not as it was when you took it but as it was after you had mutilated it and pulled it to pieces. I say that is a narrow differentiation. It is not just; it is not logical; it is not right. If you are going to pay for a property, pay for it as it was when you took it. You took it as a church edifice. When you took it it was fit for use by a congregation, and if you are going to pay for it at all, you ought to pay for it just as it was, and pay what it was worth at the time you took it. If your necessities required you to pull it to pieces, it will not do for you to say, "I pulled it to pieces, and I will pay for the material, but I will not pay for the value which it possessed at the time I appropriated it."

The committee, it is true, adopted that rule, but I think it was an unwise and an unjust rule, and I hope that the Senate will see fit to return to the policy and to the rule which has for so long a time been in force. These claims are not numerous. The claims of churches, of masonic lodges, and of educational institutions that have been excluded constitute but a very small item in the make-up of this bill, and I am much gratified to see that the chairman of the committee is not disposed to oppose their restoration to the bill.

In answer to the question of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], I will say that there has not only been no understanding that the other members of the committee will antagonize that proposition which the chairman is not willing to antagonize, but, on the contrary, every member of the committee is free to do as he sees fit, and I for one see fit to appeal to the Senate to return to the wise and just rule which for a long time has been recognized in this body.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I did not catch all that the Senator from Virginia said, and I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the committee's report is in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims?

Mr. MARTIN. These claims are sent to the Court of Claims, not for adjudication, but for findings of fact. The court in each case finds the facts.

Mr. PILES. What I am trying to get at now——

Mr. MARTIN. And in the cases which are under discussion the court found, for instance, that a church was taken for the use of the Army; that it was worth $1,500. If, however, the evidence showed that it was pulled down and the material used for building a hospital or a bridge or a fort, the committee refused to pay the value of $1,500, but desire the case to go back to the Court of Claims and have the Court of Claims make another finding and determine what the materials—the lumber, brick, etc.—were worth at the time and place they were used as lumber, brick, etc., and not as a church, with a view ultimately of paying the value of the material, but being unwilling to pay the value of the church.

Mr. PILES. I understand the proposition now, and I may say to the Senator from Virginia that I think he is absolutely correct in his contention. If the Government took the church as it stood as a church, it seems to me that the Government ought to pay for the church which it took.

Mr. MARTIN. I think that is unanswerable, Mr. President.

Mr. PILES. The people build churches, and the Government is the people, and in my judgment there is no use of our undertaking to say that when the people in time of war take a church they ought not to pay for it. I agree with the Senator exactly.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think we had better clear away this misunderstanding, because I can readily see where the position of the Senator will lead. Let me say that I am heartily in accord with the Senator from Virginia. In some of these cases it is proved that the church was taken by the Army. When that is proved it ends the controversy. In other cases it is proved that the church was destroyed without showing, perhaps, why it was destroyed. We then naturally conclude that it was destroyed because the Army wanted to use it, for we can hardly reach the conclusion that the Army would destroy a church unless it was either as a war measure in battle or for use. But the court in some of these cases, owing either to the carelessness of the attorneys or the indifference of the court, has failed to find specifically that the property after its destruction was used, or, in other words, that it was employed by the Army for the use of the Army, and that has led to this controversy.

I quite agree with the Senator from Virginia that that is a vague and shadowy line. We can not presume that our Army destroyed churches just out of wanton maliciousness. We must assume that where a church was destroyed it was either destroyed to prevent the spread of an epidemic, where a church had been used as a hospital for epidemic and contagious diseases, or that it was destroyed for the purpose of using the lumber for camps, for hospitals, or for bridge purposes. The mere fact that the attorneys who may have presented the case failed to obtain a specific finding, or the mere fact that the court in its indifference failed to make a specific finding, is no reason, to my mind, why we should differentiate. I, for one, believe—and it is matter of some embarrassment to hold counter to the attitude of the chairman of the committee in this matter—that we should not differentiate.

I do think one matter ought to be called attention to, and that is that the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, although subsequently, perhaps, modified, might possibly, as they will appear in the RECORD, seem to be a reflection upon the chairman of the committee. It is only due to say that the chairman, in taking this position on the floor to-day, whatever his own views may be, is acting in consonance with the action of the committee, and he himself ought to be relieved from any criticism on that score. Now, for one, as a Senator, I am ready to vote to abolish this effort to differentiate.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to say to the Senator that while I am under great obligations to him for coming to my defense, yet I require none, because I plead guilty.

Mr. CLAPP. Just one moment——

Mr. FULTON. It is true that the committee held as the Senator says, but I felt and contended, and now hold, that that is the correct rule, and shall so contend before the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, so far from meaning to reflect in any way on the chairman of the committee, my remarks were to vindicate him from any intimation that he had been guilty of the slightest impropriety in this connection.

Mr. FULTON. I thoroughly understood the Senator from Virgina.

Mr. MARTIN. And I will say furthermore, Mr. President, that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who has maintained a broad and generous and just position in respect to these claims throughout the work of the committee, is, I think, slightly mistaken in the suggestion that any considerable number of these cases come within the class mentioned by him.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I am glad the Senator called my attention to that. I did not mean to suggest that there was any great number. There are very few such cases. That is one reason why I am in favor of once and for all closing them out.

Mr. MARTIN. They are so few that the position taken by the Senator from Minnesota would on that ground alone be well justified. It would be hardly necessary to exclude a half dozen, say, or, at any rate, more than a very small number of claims for further investigation of the Court of Claims under this narrow idea.

I myself feel that I can go a little further than perhaps the Senator from Minnesota went, for I believe that even if destroyed by act of war or by order of the commander of soldiers, church property, educational property, and property of eleemosynary and benevolent associations ought, as contended by the former distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, be paid for by the Government. As I have said, such property should be considered sacred in time of war and be differentiated from property of every other kind, and whether destroyed or taken and used should be paid for by the Government.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I certainly agree with the Senator from Virginia. I hardly feel it necessary to add that, so far as my attitude is involved in this discussion, I would be in favor of paying for church and school or any other property of that kind even though it were destroyed as a measure of war.

Mr. MARTIN. I am glad to have the full cooperation of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to suggest to him that the destruction of church property is not war? It is vandalism; and I think the Senator could well assume that the Army of the United States did not destroy a church, college, or any eleemosynary institution out of wanton malice, but, when destroyed at all, it was destroyed for the purpose of appropriating the lumber or other material.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. There are many findings where the Army on either side was occupying a church or a college and the enemy in superior force came up and attacked the place. The Army being compelled to retreat, in order to prevent the enemy from coming in and having the advantage of the shelter of the edifice, destroyed it. Would not that be an act of war?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in an extreme case it might; but still it is such an act of war that in this enlightened age should be exempted from the operation of the rule. I can understand where a church house or a college might stand in the way of the fire of contending armies that either one or the other might have it destroyed in order to have a fair sweep for a charge or for its rifle range. In a case of that kind I would not call it vandalism to destroy a church house or a college, but I would call it not merciful, but just to pay for it after it had been destroyed, and particularly when destroyed by a great, opulent, and successful Government. If destroyed by a government whose hopes and ambitions perished in the shock of battle, then it is a loss that is irreparable, for there is none to repair it, but when destroyed as a means of contributing to the success of a great and triumphant army, then it seems to me that religious, educational, and benevolent institutions ought to be spared the horrors of war. Whether these claims are great or small, this Government itself is greater than the claims and just, as it must always be, it can afford and ought to pay them, and pay them without higgling over the amount.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion. Of course the matter can be brought to a test some time during the consideration of the bill by submitting some claim to the Senate involving these questions. It is purely a matter of policy. If the Senate is willing to establish the precedent that, as a rule, claims of this character are all to be provided for and included in an omnibus bill, it is not a matter of any concern, of course, to the committee. But it does seem to me that the Government is doing all that it ought to be required to do when it voluntarily pays for the use and occupation of these buildings or, if it uses any of the material, pays for the material. If the claimants do not offer the proof and secure findings to show what the value of the material was, it is their own fault. But I am not going to continue this discussion, so far as I am concerned. I have explained the position I take on this question.

I wish, however, to state further that I am going to ask, as I said a while ago, the adoption of an amendment to repeal section 14 of the Tucker Act and prevent all claims of this character going to the Court of Claims hereafter.

That being done, I would favor bringing in a bill including all claims which had heretofore gone to the Court of Claims, where there has been a finding in favor of the claimant, except where laches have been found or the claim has been excluded because of the rule that we have just stated. I favor bringing in a bill providing for all of them, because I realize that the claimants have been misled very largely by sending those claims to the court. They think when the claim has gone to the court and the court has found that they lost so much there is then an obligation on the part of the Government to pay, without any regard to the circumstances under which the loss occurred.

Therefore sending these claims to the Court of Claims operates in a great many cases to mislead and delude the claimant, unless we shall accept it as a just claim against the Government, whenever the finding shows there was a loss, without regard to laches, without regard to loyalty, without regard to any other considerations that have controlled heretofore in the rejection of claims. But I hope we may proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this is a matter of some importance, in my judgment, involving more than a few dollars. It is a question whether we are to do justice. It is not a question of policy, as the Senator says. It is a question whether it is just and right; whether the people of this country have a right to demand of us a recognition that even in flagrant war there are certain things which are sacred and are not to be touched except when the very necessities of the Army require it. Those necessities may be to use the material to build a bridge for the military; it may be to prevent the success of the other army. Whatever will redound to the benefit of the contesting force may, according to law, be done. But a church is not to be destroyed willfully. As has been said, that is a vandalism. But if a church stands in the way and it is necessary to destroy it, you may destroy it just as you can the private house of a citizen; you may destroy it just as you would an embankment put up by the contending army.

We long since settled the proposition that we will pay for churches, not what the material cost, not what it was worth after it had been pulled down and then go to work and measure out plank by plank. That is beneath the dignity of this great Government of ours. The court says the church was worth $4,000, not for the material in it, perhaps, but $4,000 for the purpose for which it was erected. It would cost $4,000 to restore it.

Mr. FULTON. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. What rule would the Senator adopt in a case where a building owned by a private citizen who was loyal to the Government was destroyed?

Mr. TELLER. The rule that has been adopted, that will be adopted, and ought to be adopted—to pay for the building; not the material in it.

Mr. FULTON. Would the Senator apply that to private citizens as well as to churches and such structures?

Mr. TELLER. I would, Mr. President. I do not say we have, but I would.

Mr. FULTON. I am free to say I can not see any reason why there should be a distinction.

Mr. TELLER. There was not any reason why we should pay under the law, perhaps. There was no law that required the Government of the United States to pay a loyal citizen who had lost his property during war. Yet we determined that was but a just and proper thing to do, and we have been paying thousands and thousands of dollars to loyal men. But churches, schools, hospitals, and all that class of institutions stand on a different basis, both in law and in morals and in equity. You do not compensate a church when you pay what the material was worth. The policy of the Government has been to pay for the church. When we paid William and Mary there was no proof that the Army had violently assailed it or destroyed it. We found it damaged. The Army had occupied it. It was damaged by use. But we did not pay for the use. We paid for it on the ground that it was an institution that ought to be protected even in war.

I wish the Senator from Oregon would get the speech, which he will find in the RECORD, that Senator Hoar made on that proposition before the Senate. It is more than twenty years ago. It was within six or seven years after the close of the war. It was made when there was that feeling of resentment against the people in that section of the country which grew out of the war, which was inevitable and natural, and even then the Senate practically unanimously determined that that class of property should be paid for, not on the basis of the value of the material, but paid for on the basis of what it would cost to replace the structure. That is the law which we have established here in the Senate and in the House, and it has met the approval of the American people; and to say now that the court did not tell you how much the planks and the bricks were worth, but they said the whole building was worth $4,000, and that you can not pay for that—Mr. President, I will not characterize it, but that is not the law and that has not been the policy of the Senate nor of Congress, and it ought not to be the policy of any great government.

We can escape paying for anything if we see fit. But common decency, common respect for the opinion of mankind requires us to pay for these things. I have not the slightest doubt that when the matter is brought to the attention of the Senate the Senate will pay for every church and every schoolhouse destroyed.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNTER. At the proper time I propose to offer an amendment to the bill looking to the payment for the value of salt and salt wells destroyed by the Federal Army. The owners were loyal people. One of the owners was a distinguished Federal soldier. The property was destroyed by the Federal Army to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy. Under the Constitution the Government is liable for property taken for public uses. I believe that property, whether taken by the Government in time of war or peace, should be paid for. That is, when taken and actually used by the Government or destroyed by the Government to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy.

Judge Wilmot, while a member of the Court of Claims, delivered an opinion on that question, and I think it supports the remarks of the Senator from Colorado. It was held in that case that when property was taken to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy it was taken for a public use. In support of that conclusion the court cited Vattel and Grotius. He also quoted from an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Taney, and claimed that the authorities cited supported his conclusion.

I have not had an opportunity to examine the authorities, but will do so before the bill is finally disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, there seems to be a diversity of opinion among Senators on this question, and I think it ought to be settled, because upon its settlement will depend very largely the length of time to be devoted to the consideration and passage of this bill. I therefore move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims with direction to insert all the claims for churches, schoolhouses, and eleemosynary institutions that were destroyed. That issue has to be met and determined some time before we know how we are to proceed. It seems to me that is the most direct and the speediest way in which we can get the judgment of the Senate on the proposition.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to understand the extent of the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is merely to include those claims which have been reported upon favorably by the Court of Claims.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I very heartily approve of the motion of the Senator from Arkansas. In all those cases the material of the building was used, and the only question involved is the question of the difference between the cost of the building as a building and of the cost of the material. There are other cases where the property was destroyed by fire, accident, or otherwise while in possession and control of the Government. It seems to me those cases ought to be included as well as those where the material was used.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I trust that the motion will not prevail. It seems to me if the Senate wishes to adopt the policy of paying all these claims, they can be inserted here. If Senators have any claims which they think have been unjustly omitted from the bill, they can offer them on the floor. There is no occasion——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the motion of the Senator from Arkansas is a little too sweeping. It seems to me each individual case ought to stand upon its merits. I hardly see how we can adopt a rule that the Government shall pay for all churches, schoolhouses, and so forth, damaged or destroyed, without any regard to the circumstances in each case. There might be——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me, I limited the motion to the allowance of claims whose validity had been established by a judgment of the Court of Claims and where the extent of the damage and the loyalty of the claimant had been established. The first clause in the finding of facts uniformly is, that the church as an organization was loyal to the United States.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, after all, it is a question of judgment as to whether or not the finding of the Court of Claims does establish the validity of the claim, and that must be determined as respects every particular claim. We can not do that in a wholesale way, as the Senator proposes. The Senate can take up any particular claims and pass on them. To recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to include them I suppose would be in order and proper. But this general instruction furnishes no guide to the committee, because it has to determine finally on each particular claim.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have no preference about the mere method in which the question is raised to be determined. I simply want to take the judgment of the Senate at the outset as to what is to be done with claims such as those described by several Senators who have addressed the Senate to-day. If we must take up each claim and go over this same line of discussion again, we will be several days disposing of this bill, whereas if we know at the outset what the rule is, we can conform to it very readily.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am in favor of putting these claims on the omnibus bill, but I think it would save time, instead of recommitting the bill, as we reach those items, to take them up. I think it is perfectly safe to say to the Senator that the sentiment of the Senate will be in favor of putting them on.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me say to the Senator that I have such confidence in his sense of fairness and in his familiarity with the method of procedure here that I will withdraw the motion and turn the matter over to him to suggest some expeditious way in which we can get the judgment of the Senate on this question. I withdraw the motion to recommit, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas withdraws the motion to recommit. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to claimants in this act named the several sums appropriated herein, the same being in full for and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final release and discharge of their respective claims, namely:

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after line 3, on page 2, and insert:

ALABAMA.

To William T. Hamner, of Tuscaloosa County, $805.

To Mary E. Haygood, heir of John M. Lawson, deceased, late of Lauderdale County, $920.

To Lewid F. Martin, administrator of Francis C. Martin, deceased, of Limestone County, $925.

To J. P. McClendon, administrator de bonis non of Meredith King, deceased, late of Jackson County, $700.

To John C. McDaniel, administrator of John W. McDaniel, deceased, late of Cleburne County, $790.

To J. C. Mason, administrator of the estate of Glorvinia Mason and John C. Mason, deceased, late of Limestone County, $3,990.

Mr. WARREN. That should be John O. Mason. An "O" should be inserted in place of the "C."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "C" and insert "O," so as to read: "John O. Mason."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that these items are stricken out and reinserted, and if so I do not see why they should be read over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand that the bill is now being read to pass upon committee amendments or that individual amendments may be offered at this time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is being read for the consideration of committee amendments, and any amendments to committee amendments will be presented as the committee amendments are reached.

Mr. WARREN. The entire text of the bill is to be stricken out, so that it is really one amendment. There are several places where the spelling is incorrect or where a word has been left out which ought to be corrected. But, as a matter of fact, the entire proposition is one amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, and I think some of the Senators having amendments possibly do misunderstand it, I suggest that the rule is that the amendments they have spoken of to be offered shall not be offered until after the bill has been read for committee amendments. That is the rule, is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee may offer amendments as the reading of the bill progresses.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; committee amendments, but the several amendments which have been discussed will be offered after the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. CLAY. When you reach a State, and the committee has offered certain amendments, and those amendments to the bill are adopted, will it not be in order then to offer such additional amendments properly coming in at that point as Senators may desire to offer?

Mr. CLAPP. It certainly might be if that was the understanding, and perhaps that would be the better plan.

Mr. CLAY. I think it would be the better plan. For instance, you strike Alabama, and a half dozen committee amendments have been adopted, and the Senators from that State desire to offer other amendments and to have them disposed of at that time. I do not know how the chairman feels about it, but that would be the proper way, it strikes me.

Mr. CLAPP. It is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. The suggestion was made upon the idea that many of the Senators having those matters under their charge, not anticipating probable action of the Senate in accepting them, might not be prepared at this reading of the bill to offer them. If the reading of the bill now is only for committee amendments——

Mr. McLAURIN. I think that is right.

Mr. CLAY. It is immaterial. I thought the custom was the other way.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. FULTON obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is for a question only.

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. From line 4, on page 2, to line 5, on page 36, inclusive, appears, on a casual reading, to be an amendment of the Senate committee to strike out certain claims, beginning with Alabama and concluding with Wisconsin. I ask the Senator, and I ask him particularly in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming a moment ago, whether that is going to be regarded as one amendment or as a number of amendments. The whole matter between pages 2 and 36, Alabama to Wisconsin, is stricken out.

Mr. FULTON. I should say it is one amendment, but I suppose Senators would be entitled to a division of the question if it was desired.

Mr. WARREN. With the permission of the Senator from Oregon, I will say to the Senator from Texas that in order to throw the whole matter into an amendment it has been usual in omnibus bills to do exactly what the committee did here, striking out the first part and then reintroducing all or so much of it as they approve in another part of the bill, and then adding under each State heading as many more claims as the committee approve of, and I observe that in this printing the old matter is in roman while the new matter is printed in italics. Of course the stricken-out matter or any portion of it can be reintroduced by proper amendment.

Mr. FULTON. That was done to obviate the necessity of making so many amendments. Otherwise, in order to group the claims under the States, there would have to be, first, an amendment to insert each claim under the head of "Alabama," then another amendment for Arkansas, and so on clear down. But by pursuing the course here adopted, to strike out the whole House provision and then reinsert it as an amendment, with the different claims properly grouped according to States annexed, Senators will see it saves a great deal of work.

Mr. CULBERSON. My inquiry was whether this would be regarded as one amendment or as a number of amendments. I ask because I notice on page 32, under the head of "Texas," there is only one claim in the House text which was allowed, and that has been stricken out, and then on page 93 of the bill, under the head of "Texas," an entirely different claim is inserted. In other words, the House allowed one claim and the Senate committee disallowed that and allows another. Of course, if it can be considered that this is one amendment, all right; but I should like to know what the understanding is to be about it. If it is one amendment from page 2 to page 36, inclusive, to strike out, very well. If not, then what is it?

Mr. FULTON. I should treat it as one amendment. That is the way I have treated it. I do not pretend to guarantee that that is the correct parliamentary description or designation of it, but if the Senator has in mind the question whether he should reserve the right to move to reinstate the claims omitted, I will state that, so far as I am concerned, I think it would be in order to offer an amendment to insert those claims after the committee has got through offering its amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. With that understanding, I reserve the right to move to add, on page 93, when that point is reached, the claim on page 32 under the head of "Texas."

Mr. FULTON. I hope it may be understood that after the bill has been read and the committee amendments adopted every Senator will have the right, which is reserved, if it is necessary to reserve it, to offer amendments either to restore items which were originally in the bill and have been omitted by the committee or to add others.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I notice that thirty-six pages of the bill seem to have been stricken out. There is on one page, not proposed to be stricken out, an item that concerns a church in Kentucky. I assume that I have a right whenever we reach Kentucky to offer an amendment to include that item. It seems to me that the whole of the thirty-six pages might go out on one motion and I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that we have just one vote on the thirty-six pages that are proposed to be stricken out. Then I suggest also, that when we get to a State and get through with the amendments proposed by the committee any Senator who wishes to offer an amendment be allowed to offer it. To illustrate: When you get to Kentucky, there are, say, fifteen or twenty amendments proposed by the committee. When you get through with the amendments proposed by the committee, let either of the Senators from Kentucky offer amendments. In that way, Mr. President, we will get along with the business.

If we have the entire bill read, which consists of about 200 pages, entirely through and then go back to these amendments, we will be here several days. I think the best way to proceed is to take up the bill and read it, and when we get through with Alabama let amendments be offered that any Senator desires to offer, and when we get to Kentucky and get through with the amendments proposed by the committee, then let the Senators from Kentucky offer such amendments as they desire, and when we get through with the reading of the bill we will be through with it.

Mr. McLAURIN. A Senator may not be ready.

Mr. McCREARY. It has been suggested by my friend, the Senator from Mississippi, that some Senator might not be ready. This bill will be under consideration even on that plan for several days, and he can get ready by to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In order to receive amendments as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, it would be necessary to modify the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made, so that the bill may be read for amendment.

Mr. McCREARY. Yes; that is the suggestion I make.

Mr. FULTON. I trust there will be no change of the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon objects to changing the agreement.

Mr. McCREARY. It is the desire of the Senator that we shall go on and read the entire bill?

Mr. FULTON. It has to be read at some time.

Mr. McCREARY. If read once and the amendments are offered as the reading proceeds, we would get through much quicker.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. Is it understood that the bill is to be read entirely through and we are to pass upon the amendments offered by the committee, and that no Senator has a right to offer an amendment until we get through with the reading of the bill, unless it is an amendment to an amendment offered by the committee?

Mr. FULTON. That is the understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the agreement adopted by the Senate.

Mr. McCREARY. I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the amendment of the Committee on Claims.

The Secretary read as follows:

To J. W. Mitchell, administrator of the estate of Thomas J. Mitchell, deceased, late of Jackson County, $299.

To James A. Paulk, of Bullock County, $3,390.

To J. R. Roberson, administrator, with will annexed, of John P. Roberson, deceased, late of St. Clair County, $1,230.

To Charles O. Rolfe, administrator of the estate of Oscar A. Rolfe, deceased, late of Morgan County, $2,980.

To James M. Thomason, of Colbert County, $685.

To Cecilia R. A. Wheat, executrix of Moses K. Wheat, deceased, of county of Macon, $4,890.

To Henry Davis, of Madison County, $135.

To Belle F. Neil, administratrix of the estate of James Watkins Fennell, deceased, late of Marshall County, $1,330.

To Margaret J. Parks, of Jackson County, $1,068.

To the Primitive Baptist Church, of Huntsville, Ala., $909.

Mr. FULTON. After the word "Church" in line 21, page 37, I move to insert in brackets the word "colored." There seems to be two churches at Huntsville, one of which is a church of the colored people, and this is the one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the committee's amendment, as follows:

To Samuel F. Ryan, of Marshall County, $2,712.

To the trustees of the Missionary Baptist Church, of Gravelly Springs, Ala., $725.

To the trustees of the Missionary Baptist Church, Huntsville, Ala., $1,760.

To the trustees of the North Alabama College, Huntsville, Ala., $7,600.

To trustees of Cumberland Presbyterian Church, colored, Huntsville, Ala., $220.

To Nannie H. Jones and Mary E. Hereford, of Madison County, children and heirs at law of John T. Jones, deceased, $800.

To John D. Hereford, Mrs. Fannie H. Jones, and Mrs. Martha J. Ormon, of Madison County, and William F. Hereford, of Japan (missionary), children and heirs at law of Fannie J. Hereford, deceased, daughter of John T. Jones, deceased, $400.

ARKANSAS.

To John W. Bean, of Washington County, $290.

To Joseph N. Bean, administrator of the estate of Joseph Bean, deceased, of Nevada County, $648.

Mr. FULTON. At this point I move to insert:

W. F. Forbes, administrator of Archie B. Forbes, deceased, late of Brinkley, Ark., $2,600.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the amendment, as follows:

To the First Baptist Church, Helena, Ark., $1,790.

To the trustees of the First Baptist Church of Pine Bluff, Ark., $1,960.

To the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Clarksville, Ark., $400.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "four thousand" between the word "Arkansas" and the word "four" on page 40, line 14.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 14, after the word "Arkansas," insert the words "four thousand," so as to read:

To the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Clarksville, Ark., $4,400.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move this amendment upon the authority of a finding of the Court of Claims in the matter of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Clarksville, Ark. The allegation of the complainant in that matter is that the church, valued at something over $6,000, had been occupied by the Federal forces while stationed at Clarksville and was destroyed before the Army quit the vicinity. Clarksville was a military post maintained by the Federal Government during the years 1863, 1864, and 1865. Twenty-three counties in Arkansas fell into the hands of the Federals the latter part of 1863. Early in 1864 a State government was organized by the loyal citizens of that State, a constitution was adopted, and a full complement of State officers elected. The territory in which this church was located at the time of its destruction was therefore loyal territory. Its affairs were being administered by a State government chosen by the loyal citizens of that part of the State of Arkansas. The Confederate forces had possession of another part of its territory and maintained a separate State government.

The finding of the court is:

That the Methodist Episcopal Church South—

The beneficiary under this motion to amend—of Clarksville, Ark., as a church, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

II. The evidence establishes to the satisfaction of the court that during the late war between the States, on or about December, 1863, the military forces of the United States took possession of the church buildings of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Clarksville, Ark., and used said church buildings as commissary storehouses until about May 19, 1864, when, on the approach of the Confederate forces, the said buildings were totally destroyed by fire, by proper military authority of the United States, to prevent the capture of the commissary stores contained in said church buildings.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. Does not the Senator from Arkansas think that was an essential act of war, a military necessity?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It was an act of war.

Mr. FULTON. A military necessity? The church was filled with stores and supplies.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me read just one more sentence and then I will hear the Senator, because it raises the question I want decided by the Senate:

The said buildings at the time of the destruction were reasonably worth the sum of $4,000.

For the use and occupation of said buildings from December, 1863, to May 19, 1864, the evidence establishes to the satisfaction of the court that the same was reasonably worth the sum of $400, or in all $4,400, for which no payment appears to have been made.

Now I will hear the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FULTON. I simply wish to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that the second findings show that the Federal forces—used said church buildings as commissary storehouses until about May 19, 1864, when, on the approach of the Confederate forces, the said buildings were totally destroyed by fire, by proper military authority of the United States, to prevent the capture of the commissary stores contained in said church buildings.

I only suggest to the Senator that that was a military necessity.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understand, and that raises the question we have been debating here this morning. Here was a church taken possession of by the Federal Army in territory over which the United States were not only exercising military dominion, but loyal citizens were absolutely maintaining a State government. Clarksville was made a base of supplies for the Federal Army that was scattered up and down the Arkansas River to maintain the ascendency of loyal authority, and upon the approach of the forces of the Confederates, who seemed likely to capture the place and appropriate to their own use the supplies assembled there, the proper military authority directed the destruction of the church and the supplies that were contained therein.

The case presented is one where a loyal organization, within the limits of loyal territory, suffered an injury in the interest of the prosecution of the war at the hands of its own friends. The question therefore presented is whether or not the qualified benevolence under which it has been the policy of this Government to restore educational, religious, and benevolent organizations that were confessedly not warlike in their purposes or in their teachings, should be applied in this particular case.

There is no question of destruction in enemy's territory. There is no question of uncertainty about the forces that destroyed it. The finding is fair and square. It was destroyed by the Federal forces while in possession of the edifice, destroyed for the purpose of preventing any stores therein contained from falling into the enemy's hands. There can be no reason for drawing a distinction between that loss and one that happened in the State of Kansas, or in the State of New Hampshire, or in Massachusetts, or in a concededly loyal State. It raises directly the question as to whether or not the nonwarlike property of loyal adherents is to be destroyed and no compensation made for it.

It seems to me that, taken upon a basis of strict justice, the narrow doctrine of law books would sustain a claim of that kind, and when we add to that the benevolent purposes that have characterized the conduct of Congress heretofore we seem to have made a case that ought not to be seriously resisted.

I submit that the item ought to be increased as I suggest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Oregon, not concerning this proposed amendment, which will be acted on when the time comes, but concerning a broader question connected with the bill. The war closed forty-three years ago or thereabouts. Can the Senator from Oregon tell me approximately how many churches and eleemosynary institutions have been paid for by the Government since that time?

Mr. FULTON. No; I can not, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that there were a very few paid for until late years; that they were all or nearly all denied in the presentation that was made first to the War Department and then to the Claims Commission on the ground that churches were owned by associations of people; that some of each congregation or association must have been disloyal, and therefore for years they were ruled out. But the question came up in later years, and with the mellowing influences of time it was considered that no matter what may have been the feelings of those church members at the time, these church losses should be submitted to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts. The findings do not go into the matter of loyalty or laches, nor do they state that probably the members of the church were disloyal. So, while it seems as if a great many church claims were being now paid, there were few paid until, I think, within the last ten years.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3023.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in the observations which I submitted to the Senate upon the pending bill I directed attention first to the industrial reorganization which has taken place in the past few years, that, as it developed, centered in the hands of a limited number of men the control of the industrial and transportation combinations of the country.

I next directed the attention of the Senate to the fact that banking had likewise undergone a centralizing influence, and that there had resulted a community of interest among the centralized industrial and transportation organizations and the centralized banking institutions of the country. This monopoly of banking and business gave a few men financial control. There were no economic causes for a panic. There were speculative, political, and legislative reasons that made it important for these combined interests to bring on the crisis of October, 1907. I outlined the history of events, wrongfully conceived and executed, that brought the country to the verge of financial demoralization.

MORE EVIDENCE OF PANIC PLOT.

It is not always possible, Mr. President, to produce record evidence showing step by step the operations of these great powers. Since I concluded the other day there has come to my hand some additional evidence which I regard as important enough to submit to the Senate at this time.

This is a letter written by the auditor of the Washington Life Insurance Company to its New Jersey manager. It is made to appear as directing a compliance with "custom." It is false in that. It is not a custom, but an exceptional order directing the State manager of the company to cut down his bank balance and send money to New York. The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK, June 12, 1907.

Mr. E. A. WHITTIER, Manager, Newark, N. J.

DEAR SIR: It is the custom of our offices collecting as much in premiums as you do to remit each week a check on account of premiums collected. We would ask you to please do so in the future, sending us a check for amount in bank over $500, the checks sent to us being in amounts of even hundred dollars.

Very truly, yours, H. R. VERMILYE, Auditor.

Similar letters were sent generally to State managers of this insurance company throughout the country.

While I can not at this time produce the documentary evidence, I can say to the Senate with certainty that at least two other great New York insurance companies, controlled by identical or allied interests, at about the same time gave similar instructions to their State managers throughout the country. The instructions contained in these letters reveal, so long ago as June, 1907, the existence of a concerted plan to withdraw from outside banks and concentrate in New York money controlled by these insurance companies. This plan was conceived and inaugurated several months before there was thought or talk of panic and hard times, excepting the prophetic statements which were made by railroad presidents and the bankers allied with their interests.

The effect of this general withdrawal of insurance funds from local banks not only reduced the deposits and working credit of the banks in the country, but also greatly impaired the business of the companies themselves. The insurance report for 1907 of business done by the New York companies shows a decrease for that year of, in round numbers, $150,000,000. A large part of this decrease in business may be traced directly to the crippling of the financial backing of agents in the field.

To show that this policy injured the Washington Life, I desire to quote from a letter written by the National Newark Banking Company to Mr. Whittier, under date of September 5, 1907, in which it is said:

Please find inclosed the [name of maker] note for ——, dated September 4, 1907, which you offered to us for discount, and would say that in consideration of your comparatively small balance in the bank, that our board of directors do not think that your balance warrants as large a discount as the amount of this note.

The amount of this note represents the first premium of a policy of more than $25,000. Because of the company's reduction of its balance in Newark this agent was prevented from securing for the company this $25,000 of business.

When the well-ordered panic arrived, even this means was not getting the money out of country banks at a rate to suit the system. They wanted the money to come to New York instantly, so this is a sample of the orders that were sent to insurance agents:

NEW YORK, November 1, 1907.

E. A. WHITTIER,
185 Market street, Newark, N. J.:

Until further notice buy New York exchange in making remittance. Charge cost of draft in account.

JOHN TATLOCK, President.

The certified checks of the Newark bank could not do the business fast enough. Under the certified-check system the Newark bank would have the use of the money for about three days. Under the system which compelled the purchase of exchange and unnecessarily increased the expense of the insurance company the money would be taken out of Newark instantly and the Newark bank could have no use of it. First they crippled the banks, then they destroyed the ability of their agents to get business, and finally they deprived the policy holders of the accommodations to which they had been accustomed by denying them the concession to make loans upon their policy contracts except in accordance with the strict letter of the contract. It had been the custom to permit loans and to give cash-surrender values upon policies at any time during the year, although the policy contract guaranteed such loan or surrender values only at the anniversary of the policy or within thirty days thereafter. This telegram was sent out:

NEW YORK, November 4, 1907.

E. A. WHITTIER, 185 Market street:

From this day no loans will be made and no cash values will be paid except in strict accordance with policy contracts.

JOHN TATLOCK, President.

The effect of all these devices was to concentrate money in New York and to cripple ordinary business by diverting or closing up some of the usual channels through which money for business was secured.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask the Senator two or three questions.

I desire to say, first, that I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and approval to the splendid speech of the Senator from Wisconsin. I trust he will regard it as not otherwise than a compliment when I say that, in my opinion, he is the best Democrat and the poorest Republican in the Senate and in the United States. If I were a Republican I should be willing to support him for the Presidency; if he were a Democrat I should be willing to support him for the Presidency, so thin a veil stands between him and the throne.

As I understood the Senator's remarks, he regards the act of Mr. Morgan and Mr. Rockefeller in rushing to the rescue of the bulls and bears of the stock exchange as a little effort to redeem their false reputation in the eyes of the country and to stay the policy of the President and save a third term. Am I correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is entirely correct in my interpretation of that action upon their part.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, when the panic burst upon this country, or about that time, the Secretary of the Treasury had on deposit in the banks of Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Morgan about $42,000,000 of the people's money. Is that correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is approximately true.

Mr. GORE. Approximately, I mean. As I understood the Senator, it was with the people's money or with its equivalent that those gentlemen financed the tragic farce which they pulled off in the stock exchange.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With the people's money or its equivalent.

Mr. GORE. Now, Mr. President, I heartily agree with the Senator that Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Morgan shook down upon this country a panic which had ripened to the point of falling. I agree with him that in order to locate the little sharks we must dissect the big sharks. I agree with him that in pulling off that comedy or that tragedy they were seeking to redeem their fallen fame in the eyes of the people of this country.

Now, then, we have come to this point. I want to enlighten myself, and I want the country to be enlightened, whether he and I agree with the nature and cast of characters. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that President Roosevelt and Secretary Cortelyou were star actors in that performance, or at least congratulating admirers when the play was over?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will wait until the Senator concludes. He may have other interrogatories.

Mr. GORE. I have only this further to submit. The letter written by the President to Mr. Cortelyou on the 26th of November ran like this:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 26, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. CORTELYOU: I congratulate you upon the admirable way in which you have handled the present crisis—

I only presume that was because of depositing the people's money in the banks of Morgan and Rockefeller and issuing bonds subject to call. Then the President adds:

I congratulate also those substantial and conservative business men who in this crisis have acted with such wisdom and public spirit. By their action they have rendered invaluable services in checking the present panic.

My purpose was to fix the responsibility upon all the actors. I believe that Morgan and Rockefeller deserve the censure of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I do not believe they deserved the congratulations of the President of the United States, especially tendered to them upon an act the design of which was to defeat him for a third term.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, of course it is not possible for me to influence the judgment of the Senator from Oklahoma. I deprecate the projection into my discussion of this question of the partisan spirit which the interrogatory or interruption of the Senator from Oklahoma carries with it. I know that in the course of the debate on this bill, politics—partisan politics—has made it seem worth while to assail the President and the Secretary of the Treasury for sending money to New York in that critical hour.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Permit me to conclude now my reply to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, whatever agencies were back of that panic, whatever purposes were behind it, the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury were confronted with a serious situation. A panic was on! I do not know how the President regarded it. Sitting there, in the White House, a man who had faced all manner of dangers without the flicker of an eyelid, was confronted with this condition. A panic was on! I do not know what he thought about its inception; I do not know what he thought as to how much of it was sham and how much of it was real. It had reached a stage where legitimate business was put in peril, and grave responsibility fell upon him as the head of this great Government and upon his Secretary of the Treasury as the head of the Treasury Department. I do not know how he to-day, in the light of all that has happened since then to interpret the actions of those men in that hour, may regard them and their relations to the panic. At the time he was confronted with the panic. He must act. The business interests of the whole country were in danger. Besides, he was bound to consider that a session of Congress was at hand; a Presidential campaign was approaching; great policies, vital, as I believe, and as I believe he believes, to the perpetuity of representative government were involved. What was his first duty? Manifestly to direct his Secretary of the Treasury to do all that was possible to quiet alarm, to sustain faltering credit and ward off impending disaster. The plain obligation of the hour was to arrest the progress of that panic, no matter what motives or causes were behind it. So I assume he directed his Secretary of the Treasury to apply in part the aid of the Treasury Department where it would serve best to allay widespread distrust and prevent universal distress. Where else could that money have been sent to accomplish as much to avert general disaster?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon for just a moment. No matter what might have been the influences at work behind this panic, where was it necessary to apply the remedy, where was it necessary to turn on the hose? Where people were apprehensive there might be a fire or where the fire was raging?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOURNE in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that the fire was raging throughout the entire country, and in this state of mind the banks were refusing to pay cash over their counters to their depositors, because they could not get their money from New York. It seems to me that the Secretary of the Treasury might have distributed the money to the banks that could not collect from New York, rather than to give those banks more than their share, which they already had.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am sure that my friend from Texas must see that while the country banks might need the money, their condition was not such as to threaten universal panic. But if the New York banks were to fail—and I am not defending them, but the contrary—and if the Senator had been present when I was addressing the Senate before, he would know that I assailed them.

Mr. BAILEY. I heard the Senator's address and I know that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But, Mr. President, outside of motives, and entirely apart from the purposes of these men, I say to you that the imminent danger of bank failures and of the failure of brokers that would have produced bank failures was right there in New York. It started there, and unless averted, it would have spread the country over.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon just for a moment. In my own State and in my own home I know that bankers were very anxious for the return of their deposits, but I know that they were not able to get them and that no failures resulted. I am very certain that if the banks of which they were correspondents in New York had gone into the hands of receivers or had closed their doors, the banks at home would have been compelled to close theirs. The fact that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury focused all the support of the Treasury that, in their judgment, was necessary to avert a crisis in New York, I believe, stayed a great calamity, commercial and financial, in this country.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to borrow the Senator's simile again, if a fire were raging and it was a question whether I would save the property of those who started the fire or save the property of their neighbors, I would use my hose and water supply to protect my neighbors and let the property of the fellows burn up who started the conflagration. If it is true, as I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, that the New York bankers, or some New York interests, for selfish purposes undertook to teach the country a lesson, I think a good schoolmaster would have let them learn that lesson to their heart's content. Instead of scraping the bottom of the Treasury and sending what little money there was left over to their relief, I would have distributed it among the agricultural and industrial portions of the country, and I would have left Wall street at least to see how long it could get along without the help of the Treasury.

I regret that the Senator thinks there was any politics in this. I confess that I sympathize with the view of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I believe that if it be true that these people brought this trouble on, they ought to have been left to work it out without the assistance of the Secretary of the Treasury to begin with and certainly without the cordial approval of the President to end with. So far as I am concerned, I want to see a financial system established under which New York's convulsions will not distress the balance of the country. But at the risk of appearing partisan, the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me to say that this awful condition which he has so graphically described, so far as it is the product of law and legislation and governmental action at all, is the product of Republican policies and Republican administration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, permit me to say to the distinguished Senator from Texas—whose abilities I greatly admire—that had he been charged with the responsibility he would have been a very bad schoolmaster indeed had he yielded to his sentiment instead of to his judgment.

Mr. President, it was not a question of punishing the parties in Wall street who had brought this panic on. It was a duty, when the panic reached a certain point, to take care of the commerce of the country. This was done by turning the hose directly on the conflagration and stopping the spread of the fire, regardless of who the incendiaries were. That is what presented itself to the President and to his Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I should like to be permitted to finish my answer.

The Senator from Oklahoma suggests that it was entirely wrong for the President, and I suppose it follows that it was quite wrong for the Secretary, in support of his action, to defend what occurred; that it was wrong for the President to say that the men he then believed had aided in arresting the panic were entitled to credit. I do not know, but it may be that President Roosevelt gave those gentlemen some expression of approval that subsequent consideration of their conduct in the light of all that happened might lead him to qualify. I do not know what was in the mind of the President of the United States at the time this panic occurred or what was in his mind during its different stages; but I do say that in directing the Secretary of the Treasury, as I assume he did, to respond to the critical situation which presented itself at that time in New York, right where the trouble had started and from whence it would spread all over the country, he did exactly what anyone with a sense of responsibility to the obligations of his office and the necessities of the commerce and credit of the country would have done.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to disclaim the partisan spirit which the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has been pleased to ascribe to me, I have never condemned the Republican party when I thought the Republican party was right—and occasionally it is right. I have never commended the Democratic party when I thought that the Democratic party was wrong—and occasionally it is wrong. I condemned Mr. Cleveland for the issuance of bonds and for the favors he bestowed upon and the favoritism he showed to this selfsame Morgan. Here and now, standing as a Democratic Senator, I condemn the last Democratic President of the United States for the favors and the favoritism which he showed to Mr. Morgan. Mr. President, I hope that I have the courage to condemn wrong, whether in the Democratic or in the Republican party. I trust that I can commend the right, whether in the Republican or the Democratic party. I have always assumed that the Senator from Wisconsin was one of those statesmen who would commend the right and condemn the wrong, whether in the ranks of his own party or in the ranks of the opposition.

Mr. President, I will go so far for the present with the Senator as to justify President Roosevelt in standing and delivering to these pirates and depositing with them the people's money when the dagger was thrust at his throat; but I can not excuse him for saluting the pirates as public-spirited benefactors. I will go so far as to agree with the Senator in excusing the President for calling in the services of the incendiaries who kindled the fire and to avail himself of their services to extinguish and arrest the conflagration; but I can hardly go so far as to excuse him for saluting them as the deliverers of the country. I think if those gentlemen deserve the censure of the Senator from Wisconsin, they do not deserve the congratulations of the President; but, as suggested by the distinguished Senator, possibly when the President is enlightened by the Senator's speech, he will join him and join me in condemnation of those pirates who shipwrecked the prosperity of this country.

MERIT, NOT POLITICS, THE GROUND FOR DISCUSSION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think it very much more important to do things than to spend the time of this body in criticising public officials for expressions of sentiment.

Now, Mr. President, I want, if possible, after this ebullition of partisan politics, to bring the attention of the Senate, Democrats as well as Republicans, back to the argument. First, however, I believe the members of the Senate will acquit me of having been, during the brief time of my membership in this body, partisan on legislation in which public interests were involved. Let me say, sir, that while I serve here, be it long or short, I will be found serving and voting according to my convictions of what the public interests of this country demand, rather than what may benefit the political fortunes of any political party. I certainly have said nothing up to this stage of the discussion of this measure to provoke from anybody an interruption seeking to elicit from me some criticism of the President of the United States. I am here to discuss a measure, looking at it as I see it, believing it to be the outcropping of a tendency in legislation to enact laws that serve the purpose of special interests rather than the public good—a tendency that is undermining the vital principles of free institutions. I am here to discuss this proposition on its merits as they appear to me, and not to support the policies of one political party or condemn the policies of another. No Senator has heard me, in the little that I have had to say on this floor, advert in any instance to political prejudice in order to influence action upon legislation, and while I am here I never will do so.

FINANCIAL BANKERS NEED INVESTIGATION.

I pass now, Mr. President, to resume my discussion of what is popularly known in the country as the "Aldrich bill," and I begin where I left off by saying that the "System" produced the panic of October, 1907. The wanton disregard of legal and moral responsibility shown by its Rockefellers, and Morgans, and Rogers, and Harrimans, and Ryans, and all the lesser men who do their bidding has produced conditions which set the door ajar, out of which, at their command, may issue financial disturbance at any hour, and out of which social disorder may come some day despite all their efforts to bar the way.

Think, sir, of the work these men have done, and then think of them in charge of Government-controlled banks and the custody of trust funds. Recall a few instances.

The Metropolitan Interborough Traction Company cleaned up, at the lowest estimate, $100,000,000 by methods which should have committed many of the participants to the penitentiary. The public and the stockholders were robbed alike. That dividends were paid with borrowed money purely to stock job the public is now known to a certainty. Stock was thus ballooned to $296 per share, which goes begging now at $35. The insiders robbed the company on construction of upwards of $40,000,000. Investigation has disclosed that $1,000,000 was spent as a "yellow-dog fund" for corrupting public officials. In 1886 Thomas F. Ryan was a poor man. In 1905 Henry D. McDonough, his official representative, estimated Ryan's fortune at fifty millions. The foundation of all his wealth and power was the Metropolitan Street Railway.

Now, mark this—and that is my only excuse for citing what is so well known to some of my Republican colleagues that they smile—the very men connected with this business, the men who originated it, are to be found among the directors of the big-group banks.

The Armstrong investigation revealed criminal dishonesty in the betrayal of sacred trust obligations by officials, finance committees, and trustees. These same men are found among the officers and directors of the big-group banks.

The investigations of the Interstate Commerce Commission exposed stock and bond operations so depraved in character that the guilty parties to the transactions were compelled to shield themselves by declining to be interrogated further until compelled by a court of law. These men are found among the directors of the big-group banks.

The courts had convicted men of violating the penal statutes over and over again, destroying rivals, establishing a monopoly control of business in defiance of law, the rights of property and public interest. The very men who ordered these corporations to commit the crimes are found among the officers and directors of the big-group banks.

Mr. President, does this record invite legislation to supply these banks with money direct from the Public Treasury whenever their operations shake the public confidence and make an excuse for emergency currency, the entire issue of which they can largely control through their extended organization of banks?

On the contrary, sir, I believe that it presents a situation demanding immediate investigation into all their operations. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] emphasized that in the brief, all too brief, but able and pertinent address which he made in this Chamber.

I say, sir, that, on the contrary, I believe it presents a situation demanding immediate investigation into all their operations. If the men who control those banks would misuse the trust funds of insurance companies, and would conduct other corporations for their own advantage in violation of Federal statutes, as proven by the record of the Armstrong committee and the Interstate Commerce Commission from which I have quoted, does not public interest demand a searching investigation of the management of the banks and trust companies under their control, particularly when so many of them are Government-controlled banks?

FINANCIAL PANICS UNKNOWN IN EUROPE.

Mr. President, in no other country than the United States are the banks allowed to absorb in speculation the capital belonging to legitimate trade.

England, France, and Germany have long recognized and maintained a distinction in banking that this country must recognize and maintain if our national business integrity is not to be destroyed.

European nations do not permit government banks to engage in promotion, but restrict them to the legitimate field of facilitating commerce.

Because of the strict separation of stock gambling from banking business the market centers of Europe do not know the fluctuations in interest rates common to New York; the rise and fall of stock markets do not affect the legitimate channels of business. Acute panics, such as we experience, are not known.

I know it has been assumed in this debate that panics are necessary evils, and it has been asserted that these same convulsions have taken place periodically in the great nations of Europe as well as in this country. But practical financiers, as well as students of the subject high in authority, offer different testimony.

That there should be rise and fall in national prosperity is in accordance with natural law. Ebb and flow are inherent to the life of the body politic as to the life of the individual. But that this young, healthy, growing country should go mad financially every few years is unnatural and unnecessary. Students of the subject agree that there is something radically wrong in our business methods and banking laws making possible this frequent recurrence of business epilepsy. It was plain to every thoughtful citizen that the recent panic had no relation to normal conditions. It was the good sense and sound judgment of the American people that averted national bankruptcy.

Mr. R. A. Seligman, professor of political economy, Columbia University, says:

> If we compare our economic history with that of Europe, we observe that acute financial crises have there almost passed away. England has had no severe convulsion since 1866, and in France and Germany also the disturbances are more and more assuming the form of periodic industrial depression rather than of acute financial crises.

ALDRICH BILL A MAKESHIFT.

Not one Senator has expressed the belief that the Aldrich bill is anything more than an expedient. The most that has been claimed is that it may tend to lessen the danger of a panic, because it is hoped it will tend to lessen the fear of one. But no one has contended that it will go to the root of the evil—eradicate the cause.

The Senator from Rhode Island, admitting that "our currency system may be fairly characterized as a piece of patchwork," declares that it "has not in the slightest degree checked the rising tide of a great nation's progress and prosperity."

That is, we have grown and prospered in spite of our failure to secure the manifestly needed improvement in our currency system. But, sir, how much of banking in combination with promotion, underwriting, speculation with trust funds, scheming to form great central groups where the surplus capital of controlled banks is loaned to the controlling bank—how much of all this, and more, might have been averted if the banking and currency laws a dozen years ago had been revised solely in the public interest?

Advocates of this bill have admitted that it is only a makeshift. The commercial interests of this great country, suffering from the evils of a succession of makeshift statutes, demand a thorough revision of our banking and currency laws to meet the evil practices which are undermining the integrity of bank management.

Mr. President, the best time to work out the solution of any problem of national concern is when it engages public interest sufficiently to secure thorough and intelligent discussion.

When could there have been a greater necessity or a more favorable opportunity for searching investigation and the forming of an enlightened judgment respecting the underlying causes of the recent panic; when a better opportunity for the Finance Committee to have summoned before it the foremost bankers, merchants, and financial scholars of this nation for conference? Why should it be determined—it would almost seem predetermined—that it is not possible at this time to enter upon the consideration of a comprehensive and thorough plan for banking and currency legislation, specifically directed to restore banking to its true function in the commercial transactions of the country?

The crisis of the panic of 1907 was passed. The map of the events causing it was before us. The country was alive to the importance of the questions involved. Why delay meeting the issue? Why postpone to some future Congress the plain obligation that rests upon this Congress?

By way of apology for this delay, it has been suggested in the debate that the only time to undertake this work was in time of industrial prosperity, confidence, and financial peace.

A thoughtful American public will ask, Why, then, has it not been undertaken before? Why the distinguished Senators in control of the Finance Committee have not been working on this question in the years past, which have been years of unrivaled prosperity and of financial peace? Will not the American public conclude that the dominant power in the Senate of the United States, for some reason, will revise the national currency system neither in time of panic nor in time of peace?

Nor will the American public be satisfied with the reason assigned by the Senator from Rhode Island why a thorough consideration of this question is not undertaken now. He says, "There is no considerable consensus of opinion on any general or special plan," and hence the committee concluded not to enter at this time upon a thorough reform of our currency legislation.

How long must we wait for a consensus of opinion? Must all views be first harmonized? Must all principle be first compromised? Dispute among interested bankers, expert authorities, and disinterested legislators there is and always will be. But is a dangerous and defective condition in our banking and currency laws to continue until protracted convulsion leaves us prostrate?

Must we wait until there is a "consensus of opinion" and an agreement of all differences, before legislation of greatest public moment can be considered in the United States Senate? Shall revision of the currency system, revision of the tariff, just and reasonable railway-rate legislation, legislation to prevent the wrongful use of injunction, legislation to strengthen the Sherman Act, to meet court decisions affecting the employers' liability law, all await this perfect "consensus of opinion?"

If that were to be the recognized rule, what license is there for putting this bill through under whip and spur? There is no consensus of opinion for this measure among merchants, manufacturers, commercial bankers, or with the general public. The students of governmental finance generally condemn it. There is consensus of opinion for this particular measure among the managers of great interests, and of the great speculating financial groups, of which J. Pierpont Morgan stands as the type.

But, sir, it has been the settled policy of legislative leadership for years to maintain conditions which are intolerable except to the few; to defer legislation respecting interstate transportation, and then when it is enacted, to make it plausible in appearance and hollow at heart; because those who have monopolized the natural resources of the country do not want it, to defer tariff revision until the manufacturers of more highly finished products, made desperate by oppression, join at last with the consumers of the country in open revolt; to prevent legislation looking to the preservation of our public lands and mineral resources, and to defer currency legislation which shall make a well-balanced system, responsive to the needs of the commerce of the country, and to enact from time to time various emergency statutes, limited in their scope, to serve only the larger banks identified with special interests.

RAILROAD BOND PROVISION.

Mr. President, I pass by and ask to have printed in the RECORD what I had prepared to say upon the railway-bond provision of the bill, because that provision has been dexterously whisked out of the bill. I might well discuss it as showing the character and real purpose of this piece of legislation.

Let me say, Mr. President, we are not through with the railway bond proposition. It will appear again and again, until finally it is overwhelmingly beaten with those who propose it or until it is worked in and engrafted upon the currency system of this country. Let no man on this floor make a mistake, for the public is not making any mistake with respect to this business.

I shall to-morrow offer a resolution to discharge the Committee on Interstate Commerce from the further consideration of a bill, which I have had all this session and practically all of last session before that committee, for the valuation of railway property, and in discussing that resolution at a time when the valuation of railway property is before the Senate I will say some of the things that I might have said to-day.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Does not the Senator from Wisconsin deem a discussion of the value of railroad bonds as security for the deposit of Government money relevant at this time, in view of the fact that the $250,000,000 of Government money placed in national banks without interest was secured in part by $185,000,000 of bonds other than Government bonds? An inspection of the securities pledged by each individual bank indicates that probably half of the amount is in railroad bonds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me say in answer to the Senator from Arkansas that it is pertinent to discuss railway valuation with respect to this bill, notwithstanding the jack-in-the-box withdrawal of the railroad-bond provision. It is pertinent to discuss it not only as bearing upon the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas, but as bearing upon the stock jobbing and manipulation in railroad bonds and railroad stocks which produce panics, which it is contended this legislation will prevent, and it will not take, let me say to the Senator from Arkansas, very much persuasion to induce me to take it up. I am rather aching to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULBERSON. Let us have it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will do so, because I am sure if he treats it with the same breadth of comprehension that he has the other points, it will be most interesting.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would be utterly impossible for me to do so and conclude to-day, but if I felt that I might have the indulgence of the Senate for another day I would take up railway valuation and discuss it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not discover any disposition on the part of the Senate to limit the Senator's time or to unduly interfere with the progress of his argument. I should be glad to hear it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, since there is no outspoken dissent anywhere, I will do so; and I want to say to the Senate that I had not made any arrangement with the Senator from Arkansas for this. I will cover in a way the discussion of railway bonds as a basis for currency issue and as a basis for Treasury deposits and as a basis for and corrective of panics in Wall street. I suppose I will find myself before I get through with it discussing its appearance in the bill and its withdrawal from the bill as throwing a light upon this legislation which I believe ought to penetrate the minds of all the Senators upon this floor before they vote.

The bill proposed to accept interest-bearing bonds as a basis for securing additional circulating notes. It proposed that the Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary, should accept State and municipal bonds and certain railroad bonds.

BILL PREFERRED RAILROAD BONDS.

Now, in order to distinguish the difference in the attitude of this bill toward municipal bonds and railroad bonds, just look at the difference in the test which was applied in the bill—although it may be pertinent for me to ask before proceeding further, as I was not here during the morning hour and do not know all that happened, whether the provision with respect to State, municipal, and county bonds is still in the bill.

It is interesting and instructive to compare the test this bill proposed to apply to railroad bonds as basis of security for currency with the test provided for acceptance of municipal bonds for the same purpose. Observe the test which it proposes to apply to determine the acceptability of municipal bonds:

First. No municipal bonds will be accepted unless issued by a municipality or district which has been in existence for ten years.

Second. No bonds of any municipality or district will be accepted where such municipality or district has, within a period of ten years, defaulted in the payment of any part of principal or interest on any funded debt authorized to be contracted by it.

Third. No bond of any municipality or district will be accepted where the net funded indebtedness exceeds 10 per cent of the valuation of its taxable property ascertained by the last preceding valuation of property for the assessment of taxes.

In the foregoing, evidence is given of a desire on the part of the committee to place the valuation of municipal bonds upon the true basis of and require that it shall have relation to the taxable, physical property back of such bonds.

Compare the care exercised in this case with the test to be applied in determining the character of the railway bonds proposed as a basis for additional circulating notes:

The Treasurer, with the approval of the Secretary, shall accept the first mortgage bonds of any railway reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where such railway company has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent annually on its capital stock for a period of five years previous to the deposit of such bonds.

In determining the acceptance of first mortgage railway bonds of reporting railroads as a basis for currency circulation, the sole test required under this proposed bill is the payment of 4 per cent dividends on the total stock issue continuously for five years.

OFFICIAL DISCRETION NO SAFEGUARD.

Under the terms of this bill it is very doubtful that the Secretary of the Treasury could exercise any discretion to reject any railroad bonds, whether watered or not, that might be offered to secure circulating notes, if they met these simple requirements. But, admitting that the bill confers that right and duty upon him, it would be impossible for him, under the pressure to which he is subjected in times of financial stress, involving industrial and financial calamity, and threatening the very integrity of the Treasury itself, to exercise his discretion with any degree of strictness against the admission of bonds which meet the tests prescribed in the law. At such times experience shows that legal restraint is not reenforced by the official discretion, but that such discretion must be exercised rather to discover means whereby legal obstacles may be surmounted and the bounds of legal restraint may be widened, because every care must be taken not to aggravate panic conditions, and everything possible, or admissible, under any construction of the laws, must be done to ward off impending national disaster.

During the recent panic the Treasury Department deliberately refused to inform itself, at the height of the panic as to the condition of national banks, although it must have felt unusual anxiety as to the condition of those banks. The reason the Department refrained from calling for the usual report of the condition of the banks during the month of November was because the result of such a call would have been to reveal conditions among national banks which would probably have embarrassed the Department and further weakened confidence and augmented the panic.

So great was the pressure upon the Department for relief that the deposit of Government funds with these banks was increased to the amount of $200,000,000, to the impoverishment of the Treasury itself, so that it became necessary for the Department to issue certificates of indebtedness to meet the expenses of the Treasury. The Treasury had this vast sum on deposit with the banks to help relieve the money stringency, and was afraid to withdraw even the small amount required to meet its current needs. Resort was had to the act of 1898, authorizing the issuance of interest-bearing certificates of indebtedness by the Treasury when necessary to meet expenses of government, and under an exercise of official discretion, which has been much criticized, certificates were issued to maintain government when we had $200,000,000 in Government depositories subject, in legal contemplation, to the orders of the Treasury. The Secretary's answer to criticism of this action shows that he believed he was forced to this action to preserve the integrity of the Treasury itself. In his response to Senate resolution 33, on this point, the Secretary (S. Doc. 208, 1-60, p. 19) says that it seemed to him—

> That it would be a strained construction of the act of 1898 and of his (the Secretary's) official responsibility to hold that it was his duty, in order to meet the current needs of the Treasury, to invoke a financial disaster by attempting to withdraw funds on deposit with national banks at a time when they were subject to severe strain in meeting the business requirements of the country, and when any additional act or policy tending to subject them to further pressure might make absolutely impossible, if it were not already so, the return to the Treasury of the funds required for meeting its obligations.

In other words, the Department was led to believe that an attempt to withdraw any portion of the $200,000,000 on deposit, and which the New York banks were lending at a hundred per cent, would have precipitated a crash in which the whole or a large part of the entire amount would be lost and the Treasury be bankrupted for the time.

As further illustration of the manner in which official discretion is forced by the exigencies of financial convulsions, attention may be directed to the action of the Treasury in exchanging Government bonds for railroad bonds as security for Government deposits. In order that banks might have their United States bonds which they had deposited with the Treasury to secure deposits to use for issuing bank notes for circulation and to increase the supply of currency, they were invited by the Treasury to substitute municipal and railroad bonds to secure their deposits. The banks having on hand or being able to borrow railroad and municipal bonds very generally responded to this invitation, depositing large amounts of railroad bonds and thus leaving only a nominal amount of Government bonds to comply with the letter of the law, which requires that United States deposits shall be secured by United States bonds and otherwise. The construction of the law under which this was done, as well as the official judgment and discretion shown, have been the subject of serious adverse criticism, and it was doubtless realized at the time that such would be the case. But so great was the pressure of banks and so menacing were the perils of the hour made to appear that it was done. If the law was strained in construction, that was merely a regrettable incident. If censure was incurred, it could not be helped.

Promptly upon this invitation, the banks increased their deposits of municipal and railroad bonds in the Treasury from $87,232,022 on October 19, 1907, to $142,889,822 within a few days and to $200,856,628 by December 7, an increase of $113,624,606, or 130 per cent.

The proportion of these bonds which were railroad bonds is not shown by the statement submitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will say to the Senator that the Treasury Department did not advise the Senate of the character of the bonds accepted for the several loans made, but that information is given in a document furnished upon the request of the House of Representatives, Document No. 714 of the House of Representatives, and I will read a statement which I have come upon, just as I opened the book:

National Bank of Oxford, Oxford, Pa.; Delaware and Hudson Railroad; Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fe; Norfolk and Western; Central of Georgia; Erie Railroad; Greenbrier Railroad; Missouri Pacific; St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern; Wheeling and Lake Erie; Norfolk and Southern; Pennsylvania Railroad; St. Louis and San Francisco.

The loan of the banks was secured by these railroad bonds. There are numerous others stated here probably still greater than that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon reliable information from another source, Mr. President, I can state that one New York bank, which had several millions of dollars of United States deposits, put up less than 10 per cent of its security in United States bonds. About half of the entire amount was secured by railroad bonds, some of which would not be accepted as investments for savings banks in New York and Massachusetts; some of which were not first mortgage bonds at all; some of which were largely secured by collateral liens; some of which are largely, if not principally, secured by the deposit of other railroad stocks and bonds; some of which are outstanding at the rates of twenty, twenty-five, forty, and fifty thousand dollars and upward per mile on the road covered as a first lien, while for some of them I am unable to find any quotations in the stock and bond handbooks for the New York Stock Exchange, and many of them show great fluctuations in market price, falling off during the recent panic, ten, fifteen, nearly twenty points, most of them over fifteen points, from prices attained in 1905–6.

That there should be a little letting down of the bars at such times is inevitable under present conditions. In the effort to get out circulation the tendency will be to accept everything that the banks offer in the way of bonds which can be admitted under any construction of the law.

I say, Mr. President, that this is worthy of the serious thought of Senators in considering the issue of bonds upon State and other municipal securities. The time when the law will be tested, when it will meet the severest strain, will be in the hour of great excitement, when all-powerful pressure will be brought to bear to influence the discretion of one man, or at most three, whose discretion alone will hinder projecting into the Treasury and the monetary system of the country securities that may be questionable in character.

SOME BONDS PROPOSED BILL WOULD ACCEPT.

I have taken occasion to investigate the nature of the security underlying a few bonds which would or might have been made the basis of currency circulation under this bill.

Some of these bonds are outstanding as a first lien at an average of twenty-five to one hundred thousand dollars per mile on the line covered. I will not say that these bonds in any case exceed the value of the underlying properties. But, bearing in mind that the average estimated value by reliable authority of all the railroad property of the United States is placed at $23,500 per mile, and that the average of the railroad properties in three States, by actual inventory, has been found to be less than this estimate, grave questions must arise when we find on any line of road whose value is not known first-mortgage bonds two or three times the estimated average value, bonds which would be admissible as the basis of circulation under this bill. The question is forced whether, in such cases, circulation may not be issued in excess of the value of the security, the real security, the tangible property back of the bonds.

Illinois Central Railroad 3 per cent and 3½ per cent bonds are first-mortgage bonds under the Massachusetts law and are carried by Massachusetts savings banks. This road has been paying dividends since 1901 at 6 to 7 per cent. Among the threes and threes and a half of this road are the St. Louis Division and Terminal first-mortgage gold bonds, which are a first lien on 239 miles of line extending from St. Louis, Mo., to Eldorado, Ill., with branches in Illinois. The total amount of outstanding threes and threes and a half under this mortgage is $13,375,275, or an average of $51,779 per mile for the line covered. This is more than twice the amount of the estimated average value per mile of all the railroads of the country.

Another Illinois Central three and a half per cent bond is the $22,729,000 Louisville division first-mortgage gold bonds, which are a first lien on 553 miles of line extending from Memphis, Tenn., to near Louisville, Ky., at an average of $41,100 per mile, nearly twice the average value of railroads in the United States.

Chicago, Burlington and Quincy three and a halfs and fours are first-mortgage bonds carried by Massachusetts savings banks. This road has paid dividends of 7 per cent since 1902. These bonds are outstanding to the amount of $85,000,000 as a first lien on 1,648 miles of line and terminals in Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Missouri, and Iowa. They average $51,578 per mile for the line covered, which is again more than twice the value of the average railway property. The total bonded indebtedness of the Pennsylvania system is $191,561,271. Of this amount $19,997,820 is represented by general mortgage sixes, which Moody's Manual says are "a first lien on 459.69, including main line, Harrisburg to Pittsburg; Pennsylvania line, York to Philadelphia; Pennsylvania and various smaller branches; also on the lease of the Harrisburg, Portsmouth, Mount Joy and Lancaster Railroad, extending from Harrisburg to Dillerville and Columbia, Pa." If these securities are held to be first-mortgage bonds within the meaning of the bill, they would have been otherwise admissible for deposit. They represent a bonded debt of about $43,473 per mile for the line upon which they constitute a first mortgage.

The Pennsylvania has paid dividends since 1901 at 6 to 6½ per cent. These bonds are admitted as first-mortgage bonds for savings-bank investment in Massachusetts and would, presumably, have been accepted as a basis for currency circulation under this bill.

The New York, Lackawanna and Western Railway is a part of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western system, being operated by the latter company under lease and perpetuity. Under this lease the lessee company pays an annual dividend of 5 per cent on the stock of the leased company. There are outstanding among the obligations of the New York, Lackawanna and Western Railway twelve million first mortgage 6 per cent bonds, which are a first lien on 208 miles of road, Binghamton to International Bridge, N. Y. These bonds are carried as investments by Massachusetts savings banks, although they average $57,691 per mile, a sum almost two and a half times the average true value of the physical property of railroads in the United States.

The Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway, which is controlled through stock ownership and operated as a part of the New York Central system, has paid dividends since 1891, ranging from 6 to 10 per cent. A part of the bonded debt of this road is the $50,000,000 first mortgage 3½ per cent gold bonds, which are secured upon 879 miles of line owned and 224 miles of proprietary lines, in all 1,103 miles. That is an average indebtedness under this mortgage amounting to $45,331 per mile of line, which is approximately twice the average estimated value of railroads in this country, and is nearly twice the average in the States where railroads have been valued. Moreover, about 200 miles of this property lies in the State of Michigan. The average value of that part of this line, as determined by actual inventory, was only $19,180 per mile.

The Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad is a part of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy system, which has for several years past paid dividends at the rate of 7 per cent per annum.

The Hannibal and St. Joseph Railway has outstanding $8,000,000 consolidated mortgage 6 per cent bonds, which are first-mortgage bonds under the Massachusetts law, and are investments for savings banks in that State. These bonds are a first lien on 289 miles of line lying nearly all in the State of Missouri, averaging $27,647 per mile on the line covered, a sum in excess of the average value of railroad property.

The Erie and Pittsburg Railroad is operated as a part of the Pennsylvania system under a lease for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, by the terms of which the Pennsylvania Railroad Company guarantees a dividend of 7 per cent on the stock of the leased line. Of the indebtedness of the Erie and Pittsburg $393,000 general (now first) mortgage 3½ per cent gold bonds are outstanding as a first lien on 101 miles of line, extending from Newcastle to Girard Junction, and from Girard Junction to Erie, Pa. These are first-mortgage bonds for Massachusetts savings banks, and average $43,495 per mile for the line covered.

The Minneapolis and St. Louis Railroad was under investigation by the senate committee of the State of Minnesota. The value of its line in that State was placed at $18,600 per mile, and $2,600 per mile for equipment. Inspection of railroad manuals shows that this line has paid dividends in recent years as follows: 1901, 4 per cent; 1902, 5 per cent; 1903, 5 per cent; 1904, 2½ per cent. It has a total bonded indebtedness of $19,565,000 as of June 30, 1906, practically all of which, excepting $5,282,000 are first-mortgage bonds ranging from $10,000 to $35,000 per mile on the line covered by the mortgage.

The most important of the various mortgages is the first and refunding 4 per cent mortgage, of which $9,845,000 in bonds is outstanding secured as a first lien on 276 miles of line and a general lien on the rest of the property and also a deposit of some railroad stocks. In view of the prior first mortgages on the rest of the property, aggregating about $4,000,000 and ranging from $10,000 to $15,000 per mile, and a prior consolidated mortgage on the property of $5,282,000, it is plain that the principal security under this first and refunding mortgage is the 276 miles of line on which it is a first lien at about $35,000 per mile, or nearly twice the average value placed upon the company's lines by the Minnesota committee. These bonds would most likely have been accepted as the basis of circulation if the dividends were slightly increased, which can easily be done by increasing transportation rates if necessary.

Wisconsin, Minnesota and Pacific Railroad is controlled by the Chicago Great Western Railway through stock ownership. The Great Western has not paid dividends on all its stock. The manuals do not show what dividends are earned or paid by the Wisconsin, Minnesota and Pacific Railroad Company.

The report of the Sundberg committee of the senate of the State of Minnesota places the present cost of reproduction of this road at $16,000 per mile.

There are outstanding against this property $5,796,000 first mortgage 4 per cent gold bonds, which is an average of over $21,000 per mile on the total 271 miles of line.

Of course, if this road can show dividends of 4 per cent on its stock, its bonds could have been deposited under the proposed bill, and they would have become security for circulating notes in excess of the value of the security. Dividends are only a question of how much the public can be made to pay.

The Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Railway Company has a total bonded debt as of June 30, 1906, of $164,587,000. It has paid dividends recent years as follows: 1899 to 1902, 5 per cent; 1903, 7 per cent; 1904, 8¼ per cent; 1905, 6¼ per cent; 1906, 6 per cent. Of the bonded debt $12,500,000 first 6s constitute a mortgage on 764 miles of main line, Chicago to Council Bluffs, an average of $16,360 per mile for the line covered.

Sixty-one million five hundred and eighty-one thousand dollars general gold 4s are outstanding, secured by a first lien upon 2,403 miles of road and appurtenances, and also secured by a second lien on 764 miles, and collateral lien on 93 miles. We have here an instance of first-mortgage bonds at $25,626 per mile on the line covered. They are first-mortgage bonds for investment for savings banks and trust funds in New York, and would, presumably, be admissible under this bill, although they amount to more than the average value of railroad property in the United States on a line of road commonly regarded as below the average in character of construction, which runs through a section of country where the difficulties and cost of construction are generally supposed to be much below the average for the country as a whole.

The Philadelphia and Erie Railroad is operated by the Pennsylvania under a nine hundred and ninety-nine year lease. Dividends have been paid on common and special stock for several years past ranging from 4 per cent to 7 per cent. The bonded indebtedness consists of $19,823,000 first gold 4s, 5s, and 6s, secured by a first mortgage on 307 miles of line, and guaranteed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. They are first-mortgage bonds to the amount of about $64,570 per mile, for the line covered by the mortgage. I presume that these are first-mortgage bonds which would have been accepted as the basis of currency circulation under the proposed bill, although they amount to nearly three times the average value of railroad property.

New York Central and Hudson River Railroad refunding mortgage 3½ per cent gold bonds are accepted as first-mortgage bonds under the Massachusetts law and are carried by the savings banks of that State. Since 1900 this line had paid dividends at 5 and 6 per cent per annum. These bonds to the amount of $85,000,000 are outstanding as a first lien on 808 miles of line, and are additionally secured, it is said, on certain bridge stock and leasehold interests. On the tangible property covered by the mortgage the bonds outstanding average $105,098 per mile of line, or more than four times the average value per mile of railroad property in the United States.

As already stated, without a valuation of the physical properties of these roads, no one is able to prove that the amount of bonds outstanding in any of these instances exceeds the value of the property on which they are secured; but the presumption surely ought to prevail against them until an inventory establishes the facts respecting their value. In no case does the par or market value of railroad bonds raise any presumption as to the true value of the property upon which they are secured. For the Government to issue currency on these bonds as security without knowing anything about the value of the security would be a leap in the dark.

For us to pass laws here that lend Government credit to railroad financiering schemes that guarantee, in a measure, railroad securities and adopt railroad securities, good, bad, and indifferent into the currency system of the country, without either discrimination or investigation, could not be justified under any pretext of serving the public interest.

GOVERNMENT CREDIT FOR WATERED BONDS.

But, sir, waiving the question of the sufficiency of the test which this bill proposed as a protection to the Government in accepting railway bonds for currency issue, could it be just for other reasons of profound public interest to enace or even propose such legislation?

The ability of a railway company to pay a given dividend upon its stock depends directly upon the rates which it shall charge for transportation, which is the only commodity it has to sell to the public upon which it can realize returns out of which to pay dividends. The just basis for transportation charges is well settled. As a common carrier, the railway company is entitled to charge sufficiently high rates to pay operating expenses and a reasonably fair return upon the fair value of the property which it uses for the convenience of the public. This is the standard, and the only standard, by which to measure reasonable rates. To secure the application of this standard to the railway rates of the country has been the object of a struggle extending over many years. The courts have sanctioned it, the Interstate Commerce Commission has urged it upon the attention of Congress, and common justice to the public interest demands it. Tried by this standard, if a railway company has grossly overcapitalized its property, it can not rightfully impose upon the public a transportation charge to pay any return or dividend upon this fictitious capitalization. It does not signify that the public have not yet been able to secure the application of this standard to the rates of the country. Their cause is just, and its defeat from year to year has been accomplished only through the powerful influences which the great transportation companies of the country and those interested in their securities have been able to successfully exert in preventing legislation.

To-day we are confronted with the astounding proposition that Congress shall hold out a legislative inducement for the exactions of transportation charges which shall net a continuous 4 per cent dividend on railway capitalization. It is idle to say that this measure was limited in its scope; that it had reference simply to a limited issue of railway bonds as security. He is blind, indeed, who does not see the ultimate effect of a proposition which directly or indirectly raises a standard for the payment of a fixed dividend upon railway capitalization without regard to the value of the property. The certain effect of this action by Congress would be to stimulate every railway company within the purview of this statute to maintain the position of its bonds within the favored class, and every other railway company to qualify at the earliest possible moment for admission to the favored class.

Mr. President, let me urge upon the attention of Senators here this afternoon the relevancy of this discussion as bearing upon the bill just as it stands to-day. Put municipal bonds into the Treasury as a basis of currency circulation, and at another session you will have railway bonds driving that wedge home and getting admission into the Treasury as a basis of circulation. It is not the first time in the history of legislation that the chairman of the Committee on Finance has brought forth a proposition here to work by legislative decree railway bonds into the Treasury Department as bearing upon the financial operations of that great Department of the Government.

PREMIUM ON RAILROAD RATE EXTORTION.

It is as plain, sir, as the noonday sun that the direct effect of this proposition would be to advance railway rate charges, and that it would identify the Government with a maintenance of rates in all cases where it had accepted railway bonds for currency circulation. Any legislation, Mr. President, is most dangerous which even temporarily throws the influence of those intrusted with the administration of government in the Executive Departments in opposition to general public interest. Railway bonds, once in the possession of the Treasury Department as security for circulation issued—an issue back of which is pledged the Government faith—must have, in greater or less degree, the active support of the Government to maintain the credit and standing of such security.

It is no answer to say, as did the Senator from Rhode Island in attempted reply to the criticism of the junior Senator from Michigan, that the Government could demand additional securities whenever railway bonds are discredited for any reason. Suppose, sir, that it would be futile to make such demand upon the banks which have pledged the securities in question. Suppose, for instance, that the group of twelve New York banks known as the "Morse chain" had acquired, together with their connections in other States, holdings of railway bonds, and had deposited those bonds with the Treasury Department, taking out circulation therefor. What response would meet the demands of the Secretary of the Treasury upon such a string of banks for other and better security? Such a demand made, much less enforced, might at a critical juncture precipitate financial disaster so vast in extent that our country could not recover from it in a decade. Why, sir, during the recent panic the Government did not dare to call even for the usual bank statements from national banks. Will anyone question that if this event occurred coincident with an effort to secure legislation which would place the railway rates of the country upon a just basis, in compliance with the legal and equitable standard, will anyone question that all the power of an Administration, whose Treasury Department had issued its circulating notes based upon railway bonds, which might be disqualified, would be exercised against such legislation?

Hence, logically, as a result of this railway-bond provision, we would put the Government in an attitude of temporary, if it might not develop into permanent, opposition to public interest.

The railway lobby, always powerful in maintaining its interest in legislation, would be further reenforced by such legislation. All holders of railway bonds, the prices of which would be enhanced by the operation of such a law, and all holders of railway bonds seeking admission to the favored market which such a law would make for the bonds of roads paying 4 per cent on fictitious, as well as legitimate, capitalization, would, with added incentive, mass their power and influence against any legislation seeking to regulate railway rates upon the basis of the actual value of railway property rather than upon the basis recognized by this bill.

Ah, but we were informed by the Senator from Rhode Island (who in the debate on this bill March 5 interrupted the junior Senator from Michigan to declare that "the twentieth section of the interstate-commerce act furnishes ample machinery to ascertain the character and the value of these bonds."

Mr. President, I deny that section 20 of the interstate-commerce act confers any such power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Section 20 of the interstate-commerce act stood for nineteen years unchanged. It was never claimed by anyone to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the ability to ascertain the value of the physical property of a railway company. That it is necessary to ascertain the physical value of railway property to determine the reasonableness of railway rates is approved by the courts, applied in at least two States, and is declared to be necessary by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

THE NEED FOR RAILROAD VALUATION.

In its report to Congress for 1906 it said:

Among the subjects which deserve the attention of the Congress is the need of a trustworthy valuation of railway property. No tribunal upon which the duty may be imposed, whether legislative, administrative, or judicial, can pass a satisfactory judgment upon the reasonableness of railway rates without taking into account the value of railway property.

Mr. President, the dictates of reason, the decision of the courts, the declarations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, make the valuation of the physical property of the railroad a basic fact in fixing reasonable rates. The ascertainment of reasonable rates will determine the dividend which shall be paid. If the property is grossly overcapitalized, that dividend, upon the establishment of a reasonable rate, may fall below 4 per cent. Without the value of the physical property of the railway, commission and court are alike powerless to determine the reasonable rate, the lawful rate. A road which maintains excessive rates may thus wrongfully pay 4 per cent dividends and more upon fictitious capitalization, and the Government, by way of rewarding its extortion, would place its bonds in the favored class of securities accepted for issuance of currency.

But the Senator from Rhode Island insists that "section 20 of the interstate-commerce act as amended by the 'rate bill,' so-called, furnishes ample machinery to ascertain the character and value of these bonds." Will the Senator from Rhode Island contend that section 20 was so amended as to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the value of the physical property of the railway companies of the country? I think not. All that anyone will claim for the amended section, in this particular, is that it will authorize the employment of "special agents or examiners" to exercise administrative supervision over the railway accounts. This is the substance and effect of the amendment to section 20 of the interstate-commerce act which may in any way aid the Commission in investigating with respect to railway bonds. Through its special agents the Commission can ascertain whether the accounts are honestly and properly kept according to the system which it has prescribed, whether the charges to operating expenses are properly made, and whether the dividends are correctly entered and paid over, and the amount of the same.

But, Mr. President, this does not determine the true value of the bond any more than the high interest rate of an excessive loan would be proof of the value of a first mortgage upon real estate. The value of the property covered by the mortgage determines the value of the security. The value of the physical property of the railway company is vital in determining the character and value of the first mortgage bonds upon the road.

But more than that. In its last annual report (advance copy) the Interstate Commerce Commission urges that they be authorized and empowered to make an inventory of the physical property of the railroads of the country, not only for the purpose of ascertaining the reasonableness of capitalization and the reasonableness of schedule rates, but "to make effective administration of the depreciation accounts" and "the correct interpretation of the balance sheet." With all that may be claimed for section 20 as amended, it appears that even as to the accounting of railroads a valuation of their physical properties was considered vitally essential.

The Commission says:

Before the close of the present fiscal year the Commission will be in a position to prescribe a standard form of balance sheet. The purpose of a balance sheet is to disclose the financial standing of a corporation, and this it does by placing in parallel columns a statement of assets and of liabilities. But in the case of railway companies the Commission is unable to test the accuracy of the assets reported, and there is no feasible means of providing such a test other than by a detailed inventory of the property which the assets represent. If Congress designed by the provision which it made for a prescribed system of accounts that the Commission should do what lies in its power to guarantee the sound financing of railways, the necessity for making an inventory appraisal of railway property can not longer be delayed.

From whatever point of view this question of valuation be regarded, whether of reasonable capitalization, of a reasonable schedule of rates, of effective administration of the depreciation accounts, or of the correct interpretation of the balance sheet, one is forced to conclude that an authoritative valuation of railway property is the next important step in the development of governmental supervision over railway administration.

But, Mr. President, suppose the Commission did not urge the valuation of the physical property of railways as a basis for ascertaining their reasonable capitalization and for determining the reasonableness of their rates; suppose the courts had never enunciated the relation of physical valuation to reasonable rates; nay, go further, suppose the Commission and the courts had declared for rates based upon fictitious capitalization, in the end there would be established a commission that would make valuation the determining factor in fixing the just standard of rates, and the courts would finally be compelled to revise their errors of judgment and announce the decree of justice.

If it is a confiscation of the property of a common carrier to make it serve the public for less than will maintain its property, pay its operating expenses, and give it a just return upon investment, it is equally a confiscation of the property of the public to fix a schedule of rates which pays 4 per cent or any other dividend upon fictitious railway capitalization. And, sir, to pass legislation which by indirection sanctions or encourages, or by implication recognizes as just, the payment of any dividend rate excepting one based upon the fair value of the property dedicated to the public use is a legislative crime.

What do Senators think would be the real purpose of working railway bonds into the currency system of the Government? What do Senators think would be the effect of naming railway bonds in the law as security for currency circulation? Perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island will say they are already there as security for Government deposits. If so, they are there only by dictum of an administration officer and, at that, only there as additional security for the return of a loan. They are not there by express legislative sanction. They are not there as a basis for a currency issue. But when they have once been specifically incorporated in the law, when once the Government invites the national banks of the country to invest in them for the patriotic purpose of averting financial disaster, these railroad bonds would become sacred paper. The good faith of the country would be pledged to defeat any legislation that suggests a disturbance of the 4 per cent dividend upon the stocks. The Senator from Rhode Island would be heard in solemn warning. We would be told that the bonds were bought by the banks, not to make money but to be held in readiness to protect the credit and commerce of the country; that bond markets are easily disturbed; that such security is delicate and sensitive; that legislation menacing dividends, even upon grossly watered stocks, would alarm the holders of these bonds and force them upon a falling market at great sacrifice, possibly producing panic, and leaving the banks but partially prepared to take out emergency currency.

WOULD BLOCK RAILROAD VALUATION.

Could any plan have been devised which would be more effective in blocking the way of legislation for valuation of the physical properties of railways and defeating the final reduction of rates to a just and reasonable basis? Coming as they do in the guise of reenforcement to failing credit, these bonds are made to appear as promoters of public interest. Let no Senator be deceived. The public will not be misled. There are many and moving reasons back of this railway-bond proposition.

The public has grown insistent for legislation that shall not only recognize an unreasonable rate as unlawful, and proclaim the right to reasonable rates as the amended interstate-commerce act does, but legislation which should clothe a commission with authority to ascertain the true value of railway property as the only means of determining reasonable rates, and then direct the commission to base rates upon the value so ascertained, which the amended interstate-commerce act wholly fails to do.

The public is insistent. Legislation for more than a quarter of a century has juggled with this question. It is opportune for us to remember that the struggle to secure reasonable rates started thirty-four years ago. A generation of men have gone to their graves since this contest began, and yet there is no Federal law under which a reasonable rate can be determined to-day. It is unnecessary to comment on the influences which have baffled all efforts to secure the legislation necessary to determine the gross overcapitalization of the railways of the country.

The citizen has acquired a clear understanding with respect to it. He can no longer be satisfied with statutes which assert that rates shall be reasonable, and which fail utterly to provide reasonable rates. He might be pacified for a brief time with railway-rate legislation which was heralded forth as a great progressive achievement, but he soon learned that it did not relieve him from the burden of excessive rates. In the mind of the citizen, one simple business proposition has found definite lodgment. He clearly understands that in order to determine the amount of profit in any business three things must be definitely known: First, the value of the property used in the business must be determined by inventory. Second, the annual cost of operating the business must be ascertained. Third, the annual income from the business must be ascertained. From these factors the percentage of net profits can be exactly determined. He applies these simple and sound business propositions to the common carrier. He knows that legislation provides that the common carrier should report the annual cost of operating its business and the income derived, but he knows also that legislation has failed to provide for taking an inventory of the property employed in the business of the common carrier, and that without that inventory from which to determine the value of the property no one can tell whether the common carrier is making a profit of 4 or a profit of 40 per cent upon the fair value of the property. From every hamlet and village of the country comes a demand for railroad valuation.

RAILROAD VALUATION DEMANDED.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. In view of the ephemeral, uncertain, and fickle character, to say nothing of the elastic features which the Senator ascribes to the railroad bonds, I wish to make an inquiry of him.

I understood the Senator, in response to inquiries of several Senators, to justify and applaud the action of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury in the concentration of the deposits in New York at the time of the acuteness of the panic, to the exclusion of the demands of the banks in the other parts of the country. In view of the character which he ascribes to the railroad bonds and the overvaluation of property that they represent, I desire to ask the Senator if he also approves and applauds the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in receiving bonds of that class as a security for the deposits of the money of the United States in the several national banks of the country?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know, supposing the case, what I might have done in that situation.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon a further interruption—I am referring particularly now——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand.

Mr. BACON. To such a deposit as the Senator from Arkansas read from the report as one made in that particular case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say this: I do not believe that such securities are within the law, excepting as securities in addition to Government bonds for such deposits. I do not believe that the law warrants the loaning of Government moneys upon that class of securities independent of Government bonds.

But, I might add, it is really not a distinction of great consequence whether the Treasury accepts all the security for United States deposits in the form of municipal and railroad bonds or whether it requires also a nominal amount of United States bonds, as may be done under the construction of the law which has prevailed for several years, which Congress has made no effort to change or preclude by amendment of the law.

TENDENCIES OF FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

Now, Mr. President, if I may have the indulgence of the Senate a little further, I desire to come back to the consideration of the pending bill, and in order to interpret that bill and pass judgment upon it I believe it should be studied in the light of preceding legislation relative to banking and currency.

It seems to me that the tendency of legislation with respect to banking and currency has been to favor the great banking institutions having community of interest with the powers that control the industrial and transportation life of the country.

I want to call attention just for a moment to one phase of legislation in the mind of every Senator here as showing the operation of legislation written in the statutes away back many years ago.

The law as to reserves in national banks is so framed as to drain the reserves of the country banks to the reserve city banks and from the reserve city banks into the central reserve banks. As developed in operation it masses an excess of the banking reserves in Wall street, where it may be absorbed in speculation. Let me state a particular instance which I do not believe has been brought to the attention of the Senate in the debates here.

In 1904 the lawful money reserves of the national banks of the country increased fifty millions. Operations in Wall street for that year created extraordinary demands. The effect upon the reserves of the country was significant. Of the total increase of $55,000,000 in lawful reserves for that year the gain in the lawful money reserves of the national banks of New York City was $24,000,000. Out of this total gain of $24,000,000 in lawful money reserves for all the national banks of New York the four great national banks in the two groups, viz, the National City, the National Bank of Commerce, the First National, and the Chase National, absorbed $20,600,000. Thus 85 per cent of the gain of reserves in New York City and 38 per cent of the cash gain of all the national banks of the United States was gathered in by these four banks.

Is there a Senator on this floor who does not know that this aggravated the condition that finally put business in peril in this country last October? Is it not rather a striking thing that that was not one of the first things to which a majority of the Finance Committee, shaping legislation, should have directed its attention in bringing in a bill before the Senate to cure or to meet the troubles that arose out of that period? It is true we are promised that at some time or other before we come to vote upon this subject some amendment will be presented with respect to reserves. But was that not one of the first provisions that should have appeared in this bill? Instead, a provision which seemed to recognize the defects was left out when it was reported back to the Senate.

While the operation of the banking law providing for the redepositing of reserves reduced the reserve strength of the banks far below what it would otherwise have been, it was still too much restraint for the banks. I am citing these old statutes simply to show the general trend of legislation, simply to show that it has seemed to move in the direction of beneficence to certain great interests in this country, going back even to an early time.

The national bank act of 1864 required that banks should keep reserve both on circulation and on their deposits.

By the amendment of June 30, 1874, it was provided that no reserve need be kept by reason of circulation and that the 5 per cent of circulation kept in the Treasury to retire circulating notes might be counted as a part of the reserve held against deposits. The net results of the provision for redeposit of reserves and the subsequent reduction of the reserve requirement of the law has been to leave the depositors without any protection whatever in the way of legal-reserve requirements on national banks.

No conservative or safe banker would undertake to conduct banking business with reserves no larger than are required by existing law. Such reserves would be insufficient to permit the conduct of current business. But it serves the purposes of financial and speculative bankers to be able to have practically a free hand with their reserves, and it is in the interests of the central reserve bankers to be able to collect the reserves of all the banks of the country for use in the stock market.

The legislation of one year ago emphasizes the especial care bestowed upon these large banks. When the Aldrich bill of March, 1907, was under consideration, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] led in an effort to prevent that legislation from bestowing a gratuity upon favored banks. He offered an amendment providing, among other things, for payment of interest upon the daily balances of the Treasury deposits in such banks. The Senator from Rhode Island opposed and defeated the amendment.

While the proposed tax was urged, upon the ground that it was but just that the banks receiving the public money for use in the regular course of business by such banks should pay a reasonable interest rate, I submit that it is worthy of consideration at this time for other important reasons.

PLAN FOR AN EMERGENCY FUND.

It is estimated that $200,000,000, in round numbers, is the amount required to move the crop in the fall of the year. This is an extra strain upon the money in circulation, producing a stringency and requiring an extra reserve supply as an offset to this temporary demand.

The profit to banks in securing the use of Government money free of any interest charge operates to keep the surplus moneys of the Treasury largely in the hands of national banks at all times. The imposition of an interest rate of 2 per cent or higher would tend to return such deposit money to the Treasury from time to time as demand for it declined and the profit of retaining it diminished. In other words, the circulation of the surplus moneys of the Treasury, which constitute the deposit funds for these banks, can be clothed with an element of elasticity by a properly adjusted interest rate, giving to such circulation an emergency character to meet exactly the varying demands of commerce. Such interest rate would return the money to the Treasury as a reserve, from which it could be drawn whenever the time came for moving the crops of the country.

I am not arguing that customs duties should be kept at the present rate for the purpose of furnishing such a surplus. But while the stand-pat interests of the country defeat tariff revision, and an excessive surplus is maintained, I submit that such surplus might be made to furnish an emergency currency if a tender regard for these particular banks did not prevent the imposition of a proper interest charge thereon.

Such an amendment to existing law would not furnish as large an emergency fund as is proposed in the pending bill. It would furnish as much money as anybody has estimated is required to meet the temporary demand arising when the crops are to be moved. Is not that the only legitimate demand upon which it can be claimed that an emergency currency should issue? It should not provide an emergency fund to meet the speculative needs of Wall street in a panic, such as the pending bill provides. Nor do I believe it to be a wise public policy to provide such a fund by legislation.

Mr. President, I do not know that it would be possible to pass a bill amending the act of March, 1907, subjecting the deposits of Government moneys to such an interest rate as would cause two hundred and twenty-two millions of Government money now in use by national banks to float back into the Treasury, as into a reservoir, to be drawn upon when the time comes to move the crop of 1908. I do know that under such a law the national banks would not be retaining this money for free use, as they are at present, and retiring their own circulation in order to save the tax of one-half of 1 per cent thereon.

Because there is at the present time no demand for the amount of money now in circulation, the small tax of one-half of 1 per cent upon the circulation of national banks is causing the retirement of such circulation substantially up to the limit of the statute, or in round numbers, $9,000,000 per month. Since January last, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the amount retired, added to that upon which applications for retirement have already been filed, would aggregate approximately for the first six months of the present year $50,000,000. Obviously, there is at the present time an excess of currency in the country, as indicated by the action of the banks and shown by the high per capita of $35 reported by the Treasury.

FOR BENEFIT OF SPECIAL INTERESTS.

Mr. President, a review of the currency legislation as suggested in the foregoing would lead any student to approach consideration of the pending bill with the expectation that it would be found partial in its character to the same favored interests.

It proposes an issue of 500,000,000 of additional notes to be issued to national banking associations, such issue to be based upon the securities named in this bill. What are these securities? State bonds, municipal bonds, and—as reported by the committee and advocated by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]—railroad bonds.

Mr. President, by whom are such bonds held? Are they stable securities? Or are they fluctuating in character? If it should appear that such bonds are for any reason chiefly held by a limited number of banks, not available to the great majority of national banks, it would appear that the effect of this legislation, whatever its purpose, would be to confer a benefit upon those banks holding or controlling such securities which form their adoption as the basis for currency issue.

From the present attitude of the Senator from Rhode Island, one would be bound to believe that he considers municipal and railroad bonds as safe and stable investments for banks and a safe and stable basis for currency issue.

What was the opinion of the Senator upon this question one year ago when the Aldrich bill of that session to increase the free deposits of Government money for the group banks was pending in the Senate? At that time, as before stated, the Senator from Minnesota offered an amendment to require national banks to pay taxes upon Government deposits. His amendment was broader than that, and I do not believe that the full breadth of that amendment and its full scope and purpose have yet been brought to the attention of the Senate in this discussion. The amendment provided further that the Treasurer should accept as security for such deposits municipal and railroad bonds, as well as United States bonds, and named the New York and Massachusetts savings bank standard as a criterion. It was thought by the Senator from Minnesota that this amendment would enable banks which could not afford to purchase Government bonds at prevailing high premiums in order to secure Government deposits, to buy municipal bonds and railroad bonds, and, authorizing their acceptance by the Secretary of the Treasury, would thereby permit such banks to share in the benefit of the Government deposits.

In opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] advanced a skillfully contrived argument embodying the following propositions:

1. That banks could not afford to buy Government bonds at prevailing market prices to secure United States deposits and pay 2 per cent interest on deposits.

2. That under the amendment all United States deposits would go to a few large banks in New York, Chicago, and other large financial centers, which alone carry securities of the kind named in the amendment.

3. That these securities, namely, municipal and railroad bonds, were so unstable in character that no prudent banker could afford to invest in them.

A REMARKABLE CHANGE OF FRONT.

The Senator from Rhode Island seemed quite indifferent to the fact brought out in that debate that the Secretary of the Treasury was at that time already accepting securities of the class specified in the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. While generously enlightening the Senate from the fullness of his knowledge and experience in the realm of finance as to just what class of banks held the specified securities and where they were located, the chairman of the Finance Committee, in reply to the all-important question of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] as to the character of the bonds then being accepted by the Treasury, contented himself with a weak "I am not advised"—just as he was "not advised" the other day of Mr. Morgan's attitude on the pending bill. It would seem that on a matter which had been officially announced to the banking world by the Secretary of the Treasury; which had been avowed in his official report; which involved most important questions of fiscal policy as well as a questionable construction of law; which was an important subject of legislation before the Senate and before the Finance Committee, and which the Senator himself dignified by an elaborate address—it would seem that as to a matter of this kind the chairman of the important Committee on Finance would have had some curiosity to know the real facts of the case.

It would seem that as the chairman of the Finance Committee he might have asked the Secretary of the Treasury about it. Coming from him it would not have been indelicate or embarrassing. He did not mind asking the Department to construct for him an elaborate computation to show that banks could not afford to pay interest on deposits.

But the Senator wanted to defeat the interest amendment, and to that end argued against the admission of other than United States bonds, because he could not show that the interest would be so burdensome if these banks were admitted to secure the deposits. He did not profess to know that precisely this character of bonds were already being accepted. Evidently he did not much care. He could argue against their admission, notwithstanding that they were already being admitted, as then stated and as subsequent inquiry confirms. The Senator did know that the banks holding this class of bonds were the big banks of New York and the great financial centers. These banks did not want any law authorizing the deposit of these bonds as security for Government money coupled with an interest charge. So far as the deposit of bonds was concerned, they didn't need any such law. They had the Secretary's "construction" of existing law, which enabled them to do that already.

In an argument directed mainly against the taxation of deposits, the Senator from Rhode Island informed the Senate that one purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota was to—> Spread this money about. * * * His purpose being that there shall be what he would call, I suppose, an equitable distribution of the money deposited throughout the United States.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] contended that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota would not accomplish this purpose, but the reverse. "Banks could not afford" to put up Government bonds and pay interest on deposits. The only banks having the other bonds mentioned were the "large banks of the great financial centers."

TESTIMONY FROM THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Continuing, the Senator from Rhode Island proceeded to show that small banks could not afford to hold Government bonds as an investment at all, or to buy them at a premium, as a pledge for Treasury deposits under the proposed law, and then pay a 2 per cent tax upon such deposits. He offered a Treasury computation to prove that it would result in loss.

The Senator from Minnesota was quick to see that the argument and the computation to show that the 2 per cent tax would result in loss applied only in fact to Government bonds and, interrupting the Senator from Rhode Island, said:

> Mr. NELSON. But that only relates, if the Senator will allow me, to the matter of Government bonds, and not to these other bonds.

That is to say, municipal and railway bonds.

To which the Senator from Rhode Island replied:

> Mr. ALDRICH. I understand. But do you suppose that a bank in your State or in any State is going to buy other bonds and take the chances of fluctuation? The Government bonds are sold substantially along a certain line. They vary very little in price. The risk of loss growing out of the purchase is infinitesimal as compared with other security.

Continuing his argument disparaging bonds other than Government bonds as suitable holdings for securing Government deposits, he said:

> Take the bonds of the State of Massachusetts, to which I have alluded. A few years ago they were selling far above par. Take the bonds of the city of New York; take the large amounts of bonds which have been issued by States and municipalities throughout the Union. In these days they are fluctuating widely, and no prudent banker could afford to buy bonds other than the bonds of the United States.

But, Mr. President, that was a year ago. Then the Senator from Rhode Island was laboring to defeat, and he did defeat, the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to assess a 2 per cent tax on Government deposits with national banks. Such a tax would have tremendously reduced the profits of the great system banks which were to be so largely benefited. Quite a different proposition is presented to-day. The bonds which were then so "widely fluctuating" that no "prudent banker" could afford to invest in them are now recommended by the Senator from Rhode Island as "judicious investments."

The Senator from Rhode Island, in the course of his remarks in the Senate on February 10, 1908, in support of this bill, said:

> It is evident that the banks of the country might wisely and without difficulty or loss invest five hundred millions in first-class State, municipal, or railroad bonds. This investment would be an exercise of that care and management which should characterize institutions which have and expect to retain the confidence of the American people.

The bonds which the Senator from Minnesota was seeking to make a legal and statutory basis of acceptance by the Secretary of the Treasury were State and municipal bonds. They were State and municipal bonds measured by the terms by his amendment of the standard fixed by the Massachusetts and New York savings-bank statutes. Therefore it is to be presumed that they were State and municipal bonds of a high character. Why did it suit the purpose of the Senator from Rhode Island to denounce bonds of that character one year ago on this floor and defeat the amendment to tax bank deposits which, as has been shown, and which, as he made plain by his argument, went to these special banks very largely? Why, I say, did it suit his purpose to denounce bonds of that character as "widely fluctuating," as "such bonds as no prudent banker would ever invest in," and to-day present to the consideration of this body a proposition to make them the basis for circulation? For, mark you, if they once find legislative sanction for the bonds proposed in this bill as a basis for currency circulation, even emergency currency, it simply means that we shall ultimately have all kinds of bonds ingrafted upon our money system.

At another point in the course of his speech of February 10, 1908, speaking of "the municipal securities which are described in the bill," the Senator from Rhode Island says:

> These securities would form a part of the bank's best assets and would constitute from every banking standpoint a judicious investment.

Again, in the course of his remarks, the Senator speaks in the following strong terms in behalf of municipal and railroad bonds:

> The Congress, in my judgment—

And you may see foreshadowed here what is to come if you ever let these bonds in. Listen to this statement—

> The Congress, in my judgment, might properly, in the wise exercise of its supervisory control over the investments of national banks, require these institutions to invest a portion of their assets in this class of securities, and this without reference to their use as security for possible note issues or United States deposits. This requirement would be in the interest alike of the public and of stockholders.

Have we reached the point in this country where a few men hold control of such a mass of this sort of securities that you must be called upon to legislate into the national banking laws a compulsory statute that the banks shall make a competitive market for those securities?

The Senator's change of front since last year as to the investment character of securities of the classes mentioned in the bill is all the more noteworthy, particularly as to railroad bonds, by reason of the general disrepute into which they have since fallen. Not only did these railway securities fare badly at home in the recent Wall street panic, but they forfeited confidence in Europe as well.

OUR SECURITIES REJECTED ABROAD.

Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, in an authorized interview, commenting on the causes of the recent panic, refers to the discrimination of European bankers against "American finance bills," or what are known in Wall street as collateral loans.

He says this discrimination was aggravated by their seeing the uses to which the finances of certain American railroads had been diverted.

Within a few months the Bank of France has declined to make any advances on American finance bills, and the Bank of England, not only itself refused to discount American finance bills, but notified its customers that they must not do so. But the Aldrich bill proposed that the United States should issue five hundred millions of currency on these very securities rejected by these foreign bankers.

We have so expanded and watered the securities of this country that they have lost the confidence of European investors. A crisis had come where it became necessary to rehabilitate them in the markets of the world. Foreign bankers refused to loan on American railroad securities unless the United States would guarantee the securities. That is the report of the financial review of the year on foreign markets. So we have before us this bill, which proposed a Government guaranty of these securities to the extent of adopting them into our currency system.

That these securities have fallen into ill repute, instead of being a warning to the Government to let them alone, is the real motive back of this bill. He is blind who can not see the potency of such legislation to restore market values to securities which have lost the confidence of the public at home and abroad. That it would be the effect of this legislation to give better standing to railroad securities—yes, that it was the purpose of this legislation to give better standing to railroad securities—was admitted by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] on the 10th of February.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this goes only one step further than the proposition to compel by law the banks to invest in a certain class of securities. We have passed, of course, the time of land grants for railroad companies. Here is something to take the place. In the speech of the Senator from Rhode Island on the 10th of February he said:

> In theory and by existing legislation, railroad companies are quasi public corporations under strict governmental control and regulation. Immense amounts of money will be required in the near future in the development of various parts of the country, especially in the South and West. Anything which the Government can do within the limits of absolute safety and without cost to itself to give a better standing to the railroad securities which must be issued to provide railroad facilities in sections of the country that existing roads do not reach should be done without hesitation.

Here is a bald admission that this legislation was to affect railroad securities not yet in existence. Roads were to be encouraged to build because railroad bonds were to be so favored as to make it more and more profitable to push railroad building and railroad bonding.

When Government bonds were made the basis for national-bank issue it was avowedly for the purpose of enhancing their market value. It had that effect. It would have like effect upon these securities. Who would derive that benefit?

WHERE THE BONDS ARE HELD.

Complete statistics of the investment by banks in railroad bonds, or of the extent and distribution of such investments are not available. An extensive inquiry into this matter was, however, made in 1905, by J. S. Bache & Co., bankers and brokers of New York City. The inquiry was conducted by their Mr. Cornwall, who writes at length about it in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science for last September.

I submit it as throwing a flood of light upon the railroad-bond proposition that was in this bill, and by that light we may be better able perhaps to interpret some of the provisions left in the bill.

Letters of inquiry were addressed to about 7,000 banks and trust companies throughout the country, the list embracing every such establishment with a capital of $50,000 or more in the United States. About 4,000 replies were received. These returns were tabulated, and on the basis of the returns of the banks reporting the holdings of the banks not reporting were estimated according to the total amounts of their deposits. In this manner Mr. Cornwall believes that the total railroad-bond holdings by banks in each State were "arrived at with substantial accuracy." And it would seem, in view of the large number of the returns, that much reliance might be placed upon these estimates.

According to Mr. Cornwall's estimates, there were held at that time by banks and trust companies of the United States railroad bonds to the total amount of $913,051,000. It is interesting to note that substantially 75 per cent of the total amount is held by the banks and trust companies of New England and the Eastern States. The bulk of this, as would be expected, is found in New York and Pennsylvania. From the figures of Mr. Cornwall I have constructed the following table:

Railroad bonds held by banks and trust companies.

	Amount.	Per cent of total for United States.
New England States	$94,260,000	10.33
Eastern States	587,830,000	64.40
Southern States	6,602,000	.72
Middle Western States	147,151,000	16.10
Western States	944,000	.13
Pacific States	76,234,000	8.32
United States	913,051,000	100
New York City	206,345,000	22.6
New York State and city	294,842,000	32.3
Pennsylvania, including Philadelphia	207,728,000	22.7
New York and Pennsylvania	502,570,000	55

These figures are significant. In the aspect of the question urged by men whose experience and position qualify them to judge, including the chairman of the Finance Committee of last year, that banks which had not already a supply of these bonds on hand would not be able to buy and carry a supply of them to have for use in emergencies under the proposed law, these figures as to the distribution of the present holdings are of significance as clearly localizing the direct benefit in booming the prices of these bonds which was expected to follow the enactment of the proposed bill.

It is, of course, from those localities where railroad bonds are held that application will be made for circulating notes to be issued on such bonds for circulation. The banks which have the bonds will be the ones to get the notes when money is high and emergency notes are worth the getting.

As shown from the best sources of information which I found available, 75 per cent of the railroad bonds are held by banks in New England and Eastern States, and only 25 per cent is distributed throughout the West, Middle West, and the South. I have been unable to obtain information which places bank holdings of municipal bonds at more than 25 per cent of the total estimated outstanding issue.

Mr. Cornwall's estimate on this class of securities, however, shows, although in a less degree, this same tendency to concentration of the bank holdings of municipal bonds that prevails with respect to railroad bonds. Banks of New England and the Eastern States hold 42 per cent of the total amount held by banks of the entire country. With the highly organized banking system, the perfected community of interest between national banks and other financial institutions in this section, the entire holdings will be at the command of the big group banks for circulation purposes. In the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis it is estimated that over 27 per cent of all the bank holdings of municipal bonds are held.

These cities constitute the headquarters of the operations of the money trust and are dominated by it to the extent that whatever securities of this kind might be held by them would be at the disposal of the trust for circulation purposes. In like manner through its branches in the lesser business centers it will draw in much of the balance. Its power to command any securities in the country at will is practically unlimited. With the securities in hand its control of the currency system of the country is powerfully augmented by this bill. In saying that the holdings of the municipal and railroad bonds of the country are in the hands of the great banks of New York and the other financial centers I am only repeating the statement made in this Chamber a year ago by the Senator from Rhode Island, the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee. How these great banks are organized and dominated and the nature of the business in which they are engaged I have demonstrated here.

That neither railroad nor municipal bonds are in the possession or within the reach of the commercial bankers of the country there can be little doubt. Reason and testimony alike make it quite conclusive that commercial banking requires reserves to be held in a more quickly convertible class of securities than long-time bonds of any character.

That this is a bill which will operate for the benefit of the speculative, financial bankers is proved to a demonstration. That it will not serve the legitimate business interests of the country is equally evident. That its effect and operation would be to set the money trust up in a regular business of conducting panics for profit will appear to anyone who will give it candid study in the light of existing conditions.

At this point, Mr. President, I beg to introduce a few comments by careful commercial bankers and business men in criticism of the proposed bill. They at least show that there is no "concensus of opinion" even among bankers favoring this legislation.

BANKERS WHO DISAPPROVE OF THE ALDRICH BILL.

E. A. Potter, president of the American Trust and Savings Bank, of Chicago, said:

> In order to get additional circulation under the proposed plan, it is necessary to deposit with the Government bonds of a certain class. This would impose upon national banks in this section, for instance, the burden of going into the market to get bonds. Under the circumstances I do not feel that such a scheme would give the relief the Aldrich bill purports to furnish.

George M. Reynolds, president of the Continental National Bank, of Chicago, says:

> I do not approve of the Aldrich bill, because I think it is cumbersome and likely to delay too long by red tape the needed relief in emergencies.

E. A. Hammill, of Chicago, president of the Corn Exchange National Bank, says:

> I do not like the measure brought out by Senator ALDRICH. * * * I feel that the ALDRICH plan would favor Eastern bond houses and banks, especially those of New York and Boston.

C. A. Latimer, vice-president of the Northern National Bank, Ashland, Wis., says:

It is radically wrong to accept railroad bonds as security. It would upbuild the individual by legislative enactment. It practically puts the responsibility for the issue of new notes upon the Comptroller of the Currency. It gives too much power to one man, or at best to but three men. Money used for the purchase of bonds would be largely depositors' money. The process would lessen the deposit or security and tend to cause unrest, instead of a feeling of confidence.

A. A. Dye, one of the officials of the First National Bank at Tyndall and of the First National Bank at Springfield, both in South Dakota, says:

Not one country bank in a hundred has any State, municipal, or railway bonds. If Government aid must be backed by bond security, it can come through the large banks only. In that case what little help the country banks would derive must be secondary. They would be forced to borrow of the central banks at the high rate for money established by the hard-pinched gamblers of the East, or get no help in times of stringency.

We have had a very recent experience to teach us what the schemes of Government aid through its deposits amounts to, so far as country banks are concerned. Not one dollar so placed during the panic ever reached the banks in our part of Dakota, and it was weeks after such Government aid before we could get the Eastern banks to return even our own deposits. They were evidently needed to loan to Wall street gamblers at high rates of interest. Under the hypocritical pretense of getting funds to send West for the movement of the crops, Eastern banks sought money to replace the reserves they had loaned to speculators. * * * There could not have been a better illustration of the futility, not to say injustice, of a scheme of relief that reached only one class of banks.

N. B. Van Slyke, president of the First National Bank of Madison, Wis., is one of the oldest bankers in the United States, whose opinions command respect among bankers, I undertake to say, throughout the country.

Mr. Van Slyke says:

I beg leave to say that the provisions of Senate bill 3023 would not meet the problem attempted to be solved. Its "elastic" feature might expand to meet emergencies in Wall street, where bonds, stocks, and other securities are owned or can be borrowed to deposit for additional currency. But its contraction would be quite another thing, tax or no tax. Country banks, however apparently inactive at this time, believe that the banks in the great moneyed center should restrict their loans to their own legitimate means without calling upon the Government, as they frequently have, to help them in their shortage occasioned by excessive loans.

If banks will confine themselves to the just and proper sphere of promoting legitimate trade rather than loaning on margins for speculative purposes, there would be no need of an "emergency" currency, which in itself only palliates without cure.

John L. Hamilton, chairman of the currency committee, American Bankers' Association, say of the Aldrich bill:

The securities required are such as are carried by scarcely a bank of the country class, or those required to carry a 15 per cent reserve; and if this bill should become a law, instead of being of any benefit to them, it would be a positive detriment as compared with the present law, and instead of preventing a panic, when its provisions are understood, it would more likely cause one and leave the country banks entirely at the mercy of their customers, with an additional handicap in the way of a reserve and a surer chance for future imprisonment for violation of the national banking act. If the Members of Congress have the interests of their constituents at heart, they will vote "no" on this measure, as its passage would be worse than no legislation.

Hon. Lyman J. Gage, ex-Secretary of the Treasury, on February 19, 1908, on his appearance before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, was asked the following question by a member of the committee:

If you were president of the First National Bank of Chicago and the Aldrich bill passes, would you buy bonds with the possibility that you might want to use them, or would you wait until the time came and then depend upon purchasing them?

Mr. Gage answered as follows:

In the case of the First National Bank of Chicago I should not buy any, because they have got too many now. They have got an overstock. If I were in a country bank—if I may step aside from the particular case of the First National Bank—if I were in a country bank where I stood pretty close to the producers, where the goods of commerce originated, small factories, and where capital is scarce, and where my function as a banker was necessary to the welfare, industry, and happiness of that locality, I would take my chances on going broke before I would take $100,000, if you please, if that was my proportion of this supposed relief, and tie it up in bonds, thus leaving my constituents without the facilities I can not furnish them, and so taking from them the use of my banking power for an indefinite period of time.

Referring to the Aldrich bill, Mr. Gage said, in another connection:

I am opposed to the measure originating in the Senate.

Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Leslie M. Shaw, in November, 1907, said:

No bond-secured circulation can be elastic. It is possible, and, in fact, probable, that the national banks of New York City, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and possibly one or two other cities, though I do not know where they are located, could borrow the necessary State and high-class railroad and municipal bonds on which to secure supplemental circulation in time of emergency. I know, however, that banks in some of the cities above named have had difficulty within the past few months in borrowing the bonds with which to secure deposits of public money. It will be recognized that a deposit of $100,000 of public money secured by bonds costing $110,000 is of no advantage if the bank receiving the deposit is compelled to buy the bonds, and the right to issue $100,000 in bank notes unavailable as reserve would be no boon to a bank that should find it necessary to purchase the bonds at a somewhat larger sum in reserve money.

If one will take occasion to examine, he will discover that the banks with available bonds which can be used as a basis for supplemental circulation are very few, indeed. Those that do have them, hold them as quick assets to be sold as the needs of public business may require. The right to hypothecate them as security for circulation would be of no advantage when their market value in reserve money is in excess of the amount of bank notes obtainable thereon. Let no one deceive himself into the belief that the right to issue supplemental high-taxed currency secured by a deposit of State, municipal, or railroad bonds would be of any advantage except to such institutions as can borrow the bonds on their own credit or on a pledge of other collateral. To 99 per cent of the banks it would be unavailable.

The Trades League of Philadelphia, one of the most conservative bodies in America, with a membership of 3,000, representing every variety of banking, industrial, mercantile, and manufacturing activity, unanimously adopted a report of its special committee on banking and currency, from which I quote the following:

In our opinion the Aldrich bill would be of no substantial benefit to the manufacturing, commercial, or agricultural interests of this country, although it might to some extent have favored financial interests from the maximum penalties of a currency panic, and incidentally would also impart a fictitious value to the bonds specified, and we therefore oppose its passage.

Resolved, That the Trades League of Philadelphia is unalterably opposed to the passage of the Aldrich currency bill, for the reason that it provides for additional bond-secured currency based upon a deposit of State, municipal, and railroad bonds, which country banks do not generally possess, and imposing a rate of interest which few commercial banks can afford to pay, thereby creating a fictitious value for certain bonds, favoring special financial interests, and ignoring the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial needs of the country.

The board of directors of the Merchants' Association of New York, representing some of the largest mercantile houses of the world, unanimously approved the report of its committee on bankruptcy and commercial law, from which I quote the following:

It is no safe function for a bank of deposit or issue to invest assets held against demand obligations in long-termed notes, bonds, or mortgages, the conversion of which into cash in times of stringency can only be accomplished at a sacrifice of the principal, if at all. The policy which might reasonably create an artificial market for the national obligations in time of civil war can not excuse an extension of the same favor to State or municipal bonds and railroad mortgages in time of peace.

The high tax which this bill proposes to levy upon the issue of emergency currency, and which in the last analysis would be paid by the borrower to the banks when increased, as it would be in practice at least one-third by reserve requirements, is not only unnecessary but oppressive, and in this and other States would provoke an immediate disregard of the statute against usury. It is not becoming that a great nation should fill its coffers from the necessities of borrowers, and it is manifestly improper to pass one law which offers inducements to the violation of another. It is the unanimous opinion of your committee * * * that rather than accept legislation of the character of the Aldrich bill, which we feel in its ultimate results would be most disastrous to the commercial interests of the country, it would be preferable to have no legislation at all, in spite of the manifest necessity of some relief to the present intolerable situation.

Now, Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate, I will rest here in what I have to say upon this bill, and will resume at 2 o'clock to-morrow, when the unfinished business of the Senate is reached.

Mr. ALDRICH. Probably it has escaped the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin that to-morrow the whole day has been devoted, by unanimous-consent agreement, to the shipping bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It did, I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island, and therefore I will ask, if the day is taken by the shipping bill, that I be permitted to resume the discussion of this bill on Monday at 2 o'clock, when the time for taking up the unfinished business arrives.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope we may have a session on Saturday, but I shall not press the matter now. I had thought we might get through, or largely through, the discussion of the bill this week.

STEWART & CO.—REFUND OF COTTON TAX.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3843) for the relief of the legal representatives of Stewart & Co. and A. P. H. Stewart.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to audit and adjust the claims of Stewart & Co. and A. P. H. Stewart, agent, for internal-revenue taxes collected on Government cotton between January 1, 1865, and January 1, 1866, and which have not been heretofore refunded, and for this purpose, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, sections 989, 3226, 3227, and 3228 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby made applicable and available with the same force and effect as if protest and demand for payment had been made within the time prescribed by those sections, and the amount, not exceeding $11,208.04, when ascertained as aforesaid, and not heretofore refunded, shall be paid to legal representatives of A. P. H. Stewart and Charles A. Weed, out of the permanent annual appropriation provided for similar claims allowed within the present fiscal year.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. STEPHENSON from the Committee on Claims, January 30, 1908.

Mr. KEAN. I have myself completed the reading of the report. I see the reason for this delay.

Mr. CLAY. Did the Senator from New Jersey ask to dispense with the reading of the report?

Mr. KEAN. I was going to ask that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. CLAY. As the bill will probably be a precedent in the future, I think it will be frequently referred to, and if all the report is not read it ought to be inserted entire in the RECORD.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to that. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the reason why this claim was not paid before. It is thus stated in the letter of the Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

Had these claims been presented prior to June 7, 1873, they could have been considered in this office without further legislation. It is understood that this delay in presenting the claims was due to the fact that the claimant supposed that a letter written by his attorney to this office in July, 1871, was sufficient to save the bar, and to the further fact that he relied for evidence in support of the first-named claim on the case of The United States v. Harrison Johnson, decided by the United States Supreme Court at its October term, 1887.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, if I understand the bill correctly, it is to refund a certain cotton tax illegally collected.

Mr. KEAN. That is its purpose.

Mr. CLAY. I did not rise for the purpose of objecting to the bill. Not only this tax ought to be refunded, but there are many others of a like nature that ought to be refunded, and in all probability they will be refunded in the future. This tax has been declared to be illegal and unconstitutional. I think the remainder of the report filed by the committee ought to be inserted in the RECORD. I do not ask that it be read.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection, but I want to say that I can not agree with the statement the Senator has just made that a great many of the other tax claims ought to be settled.

Mr. CLAY. I hope the Senator will be able to see the light some day and agree with me on that question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the entire report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3843) for the relief of Stewart & Co., beg leave to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill is aimed to refund taxes paid on cotton in 1865, said cotton having been purchased from the Government, whereas the statute, section 177, act June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 223), provided that all cotton sold by or on behalf of the Government shall be free and exempt from duty.

The bill has the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Favorable reports have been made on the bill in the Senate in the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses and by the House in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, and passed the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Your committee adopt as its report the report on an identical bill in the Fifty-fourth Congress, said report being as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1396, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3500) for the relief of Stewart & Co., A. P. H. Stewart, agent, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

A similar bill was introduced in the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on Claims during the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, Report No. 839, which contains a full statement of the facts in the case.

Your committee beg leave to adopt said report as part of their report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The committee beg leave to refer to the attached letter from the Treasury Department and make it a part of this report.

The report referred to is as follows:

[House Report No. 839, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 506) for the relief of Stewart & Co. and A. P. H. Stewart, requiring the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adjust the claims of Stewart & Co. and A. P. H. Stewart for taxes paid on cotton between January 1, 1865, and January 1, 1866, beg leave to report as follows:

That the bill be amended by striking out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "Weed, Witters & Company, and C. A. Weed & Company," and that as amended they recommend the passage of the bill. They submit herewith, as a part of their report, a letter from the Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue of date February 4, 1896, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1896.

SIR: Yours of the 30th ultimo, inclosing a copy of House bill No. 506, for the relief of Stewart & Co. and others, and asking for a statement of facts in the cases, is received.

House bill No. 506 proposes to authorize and require the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to audit and adjust the claims of Stewart & Co., A. P. H. Stewart, agent; Weed, Witters & Co., and C. A. Weed & Co. for internal-revenue taxes collected on Government cotton between January 1, 1865, and January 1, 1866 (the bill reads, however, "between January 1, 1865, and January 1, 1865"), which have not heretofore been refunded, and it makes applicable to the allowance and payment of said claims, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, certain sections of the Revised Statutes.

There are on file in this office the following unpaid claims, viz:

Stewart & Co	$3,486.64
A. P. H. Stewart, agent	7,721.40
Weed, Witters & Co	203.27

All of which are barred by the statute of limitation, section 3228, Revised Statutes.

The facts in each of the cases are as follows, viz:

First. As to the claim for $3,486.64, filed in this office July 9, 1894, the evidence tends to show that Messrs. Stewart & Co. were dealers in cotton in Mobile, Ala., and in the course of business as such dealers purchased 383 bales of cotton, weighing 174,332 pounds, which had been captured by the United States and was sold to them on account of the Government, and that, notwithstanding the fact that the statute, section 177 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 223), provided that all cotton sold by or on behalf of the Government "shall be free and exempt from duty," Mr. Stewart was required to pay and did pay to the United States a tax thereon of 2 cents per pound, amounting to $3,486.64.

Second. As to the claim for $7,721.40, filed March 7, 1893, the records of this office show that A. P. H. Stewart, agent, paid from September 13 to 25, 1865, both days inclusive, a tax of 2 cents per pound on 402,156 pounds of cotton, amounting to $8,043.12, 4 per cent of which, $321.72, has been refunded as having been paid on tare of cotton. Mr. Stewart alleges that the whole of this 402,156 pounds was Government cotton. If this is a fact, no tax should have been collected on it, it being exempt under section 177, act of June 30, 1864, above referred to.

Had these claims been presented prior to June 7, 1873, they could have been considered in this office without further legislation. It is understood that this delay in presenting the claims was due to the fact that the claimant supposed that a letter written by his attorney to this office in July, 1871, was sufficient to save the bar, and to the further fact that he relied for evidence in support of the first-named claim on the case of The United States v. Harrison Johnson, decided by the United States Supreme Court at its October term, 1887.

The claim of Weed, Witters & Co. for $203.27, filed May 18, 1889, is for the refunding of 4 per cent of taxes paid by them on cotton at New Orleans. It is alleged that this tax was collected upon the gross weight of the bales, no allowance being made for tare. This claim can not be considered, for the reason that it was not presented in time. It is not claimed that the cotton on which this tax was paid was Government cotton, and the bill (H. R. 506) as it reads would not authorize its consideration.

The claim of C. A. Weed & Co., filed in this office May 18, 1889, asked the refunding of $1,384.81, tax alleged to have been paid on tare of cotton. This claim was allowed for $615.06, the full amount to which it appeared the claimants had overpaid taxes. This was not Government cotton, and the bill as it reads would not authorize its reconsideration.

I feel disposed to say that the circumstances connected with the first two claims embraced in the bill appear to have been such as to render it proper that the claimants, Stewart & Co., and A. P. H. Stewart, agent, should be relieved from the operation of the statute of limitation and allowed to prosecute the claims as if they had been filed in time.

To the extent that they were required to pay taxes contrary to the provision of law, above mentioned, they should undoubtedly have relief.

Respectfully, yours,

G. W. WILSON,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES N. BRUMM,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I expected to be able to call up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill this afternoon. The hour has become so late that I have concluded not to do so, and in view of the fact that to-morrow, by unanimous consent, the Senate is to consider the shipping bill, I will not bring up the appropriation bill to-morrow, but on Saturday I shall ask leave to call it up and have it brought to a conclusion.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT INDEPENDENCE, MO.

Mr. WARNER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5516) providing for the erection of a public building at Independence, Mo.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, which were, on page 1, line 10, after the word "herein," to strike out "appropriated" and insert "authorized to be expended;" on page 2, line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "eighty;" in line 10, before the word "feet," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" and in line 11, after the word "alleys," to strike out "No money appropriated for said building or for additional site for same shall be available until a valid title shall be vested in the United States to all the site acquired," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected on the site heretofore there acquired, a substantial, commodious building and approaches with fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, suitable for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and offices of the Government at the city of Independence, in the State of Missouri: Provided, That of the money herein authorized to be expended the said Secretary may, in his discretion, expend a sum not exceeding $5,000 in the purchase of additional ground for the site of said building. The said building, with the said approaches and appliances, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, including any sum which may be expended in the purchase of additional ground as herein provided, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $80,000. The said building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on all sides, including streets and alleys.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TITLE TO CERTAIN LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, some days ago in the course of a discussion of what is known as the "Bieber matter," I read from a report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives. I read from the report as applicable to section 21 of the act. The report as read in connection with that section was accurately quoted. The section was as stated, and the report applied to it.

The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives informs me that in conference the numbers of the sections were changed, and that in consequence the committee was not subject to the stricture placed upon it by the phraseology of the report as applied to the law. The chairman has fully explained what he understands to be the fact, and I ask that his statement be incorporated in the RECORD. I am very glad that his explanation shows that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is not, as I believe they were not, subject to any reflection whatever in connection with it, but acted in good faith.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 17, 1908.

Hon. THOMAS H. CARTER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the course of your remarks on the Bieber land grants on the floor of the Senate you called attention to a discrepancy in the numbers of the sections between the act and the report on the bill. If you will kindly send to the Senate document room for a copy of H. R. 20410 and Report No. 5011 of the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, you will find the numbers in the bill and the report agree.

The report states: "Section 20 authorizes the sale of certain real estate in the city of Washington, D. C."—this being the Bieber grant, corresponding exactly with section 20 of the bill.

Then the report states: "Section 21 authorizes the acquisition of certain triangles in the city of Washington," corresponding exactly with section 21 of the bill.

It evidently did not occur to you that the numbers of the sections might have been changed in conference, though if you had examined the report more carefully you would have discovered that the reference to "certain real estate in the city of Washington" was contained in the lines immediately above those you quote. The error into which you have fallen—inadvertently, I am sure—was that you compared the report with the law print of the act instead of with the bill (H. R. 20410) on which the report was made.

Since your statement relating to this particular phase of the question is the only one reflecting on the committee and its chairman, who wrote the report (inasmuch as the inference may be drawn from your statement that the Bieber land grant had not been mentioned in the report, and that it was the intention of the writer of the report to mislead), I hope that in justice to myself, as well as the committee, you will make the correction due us in the same public manner as your original statements were made.

Yours, very truly,

RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

JOSEPH SCHREMBS.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to have the bill (S. 3452) for the relief of Joseph Schrembs considered.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to reimburse Joseph Schrembs $262.20, which amount was paid by him, under protest, to the surveyor of the port of Grand Rapids and covered into the Treasury, as duty unlawfully assessed and collected by the surveyor on four cases of statuary for the use of St. Mary's Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., December 16, 1902.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY POST AT FORT SHERIDAN, ILL.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5665) for the purchase of land for the use of the military post at Fort Sheridan, Ill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, which were, on page 1, line 4, after the word "of," to strike out "an 11-acre" and insert the letter "a;" in line 7, before the word "said," to insert "and containing 11.5 acres, more or less;" and on page 2, line 1, after the word "land," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the purchase price to be paid for said tract shall include a settlement in full of all claims for damage to said tract and to all other property belonging to the same owner and adjacent thereto.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter into negotiations for and purchase of a triangular tract of land adjacent to and adjoining the military post at Fort Sheridan, Ill., and containing 11.5 acres, more or less, said tract of land having a frontage on the west shore of Lake Michigan, in the county of Lake, State of Illinois. The sum of $36,707.50 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment of said tract of land: Provided, That the purchase price to be paid for said tract shall include a settlement in full of all claims for damage to said tract and to all other property belonging to the same owner and adjacent thereto.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER IMPROVEMENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the consideration of the concurrent resolution reported by me from the Committee on Commerce on the 6th instant.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause surveys and examinations to be made of Neuse River from Pamlico Sound to Kinston, N. C.; of Trent River from its junction with Neuse River to Trenton, N. C.; of Tar River from Pamlico Sound to Washington, N. C.; of Pasquotank River from Albemarle Sound to Elizabeth City, N. C.; of Roanoke River from Albemarle Sound to Weldon, N. C.; of Chowan River from Albemarle Sound to a point opposite Winton, N. C., with a view to improving the navigability of all said rivers and providing channels of 10 feet depth, so as to conform the depth of said rivers from their mouths in said sounds to the points specified with the depth of the canal authorized by the river and harbor act of 1906, to connect the waters of Pamlico Sound and its connecting sounds with the Atlantic Ocean at Beaufort, N. C.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALBANY, OREG.

Mr. FULTON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1770) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Albany, in the State of Oregon.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, on page 2, line 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty," and after line 18 to strike out from line 19 to line 15 on page 3, in the following words:

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after such examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States postoffice at Albany, in the State of Oregon, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $50,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who will then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the result of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERIDIAN HILL PARK.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2986) to acquire certain land in Hall & Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill, in the District of Columbia, for a public park.

Mr. KEAN. Let me ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. This is a bill to establish a public park in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCOTT. It is, and it is a bill that has passed the Senate I am sure twice, if not three times. It is a unanimous report after the committee looked the ground over and investigated it. The park is to be established on Meridian Hill, at the head of Sixteenth street. I do not believe there is a Senator on the floor who will look the conditions over and consider the present price at which the ground can be bought and what we would probably have to pay for it later who would not be willing to have the bill go through. I only hope that we can get the item on the appropriation bill. We have passed a similar bill three times.

Mr. KEAN. I notice that it is a bill reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to establish a park in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; all those park bills have been referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at the present session.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask how much money is involved in the bill?

Mr. SCOTT. About $400,000.

Mr. KEAN. I think it had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

ESTATE OF HENRY WARE, DECEASED.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1560) for the relief of the estate of Henry Ware, deceased.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of the estate of Henry Ware, deceased, the sum of $18,732, said sum to be in full payment for all injury and damage that was done to said decedent and his property due to the seizure, detention, and partial spoliation of 758 bales of cotton, the property of said decedent, and for $15,700 which said decedent was compelled to pay to said officials of the United States in order to get possession of part of said property. And there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $18,732.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16874) to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Texas into four judicial districts," approved March 11, 1902.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECOND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. DIXON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of bill (H. R. 16078) providing for second desert-land entries.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that any person who prior to the passage of this act has made entry under the desert-land laws, but from any cause has lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the desert-land law as though such former entry had not been made, and any person applying for a second desert-land entry under this act shall furnish the description and date of his former entry. But the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person whose former entry was assigned in whole or in part or canceled for fraud, or who relinquished the former entry for a valuable consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CERTAIN LAND ENTRIES IN COLORADO.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14434) to validate certain entries of public lands in the State of Colorado.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that no entries or filings for lands in township 5½ south, of ranges 42, 43, 44, 45, and 46 west, in the State of Colorado, shall be canceled or held invalid because they were not allowed, made, or perfected in the proper land district.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT POCATELLO, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 124) to establish a Government building at the town of Pocatello, county of Bannock, State of Idaho.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Pocatello and State of Idaho, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $125,000.

SEC. 2. That proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

SEC. 3. That proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who will then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary as the result of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed site.

SEC. 4. That the building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Pocatello, in the State of Idaho."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 20, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 19, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTING NAVAL RECORD OF LIEUT. HILARY WILLIAMS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10416) and to recommit the same to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report, and to recommit the same to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10416) to correct the naval record of Lieut. Hilary Williams, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HARBOR LINES IN WILMINGTON HARBOR, CAL.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate joint resolution 58.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 58) authorizing the Secretary of War to establish harbor lines in Wilmington Harbor, California.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to fix and establish pierhead and bulkhead lines, either or both, in the inner harbor of San Pedro, otherwise known as Wilmington Harbor, Cal., beyond which no piers, wharves, bulkheads, or other works shall be extended or deposits made except under such regulations as shall be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman if this is a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. It is unanimously reported by the committee and has passed the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And meets the approbation of the Department?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. It was prepared in the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CUTTING OF TIMBER, ETC., ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4046), with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, the title of which the Clerk will read, the bill having been read on a former day, with an amendment which he proposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4046) to authorize the cutting of timber, the manufacture and sale of lumber, and the preservation of the forests on certain lands reserved for Indian reservations in the State of Wisconsin.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 10, on page 1, insert the following:

"Provided, That not more than 20,000,000 feet of timber shall be cut in any one year: And provided further, That this limitation shall not include the dead and down timber on the north half of township No. 29, range No. 13 east; the north half of township No. 29, range No. 14 east, and the south half of township No. 30, range No. 13 east, on the Menominee Reservation in Wisconsin."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. MORSE. This is a bill which has passed the Senate, and is the bill which we had up for consideration on Monday afternoon under suspension of the rules. There was objection on account of the fact that there was no limitation upon the amount of timber which could be cut under the act, and I have put in this provision:

Provided, That not more than 20,000,000 feet shall be cut per year outside of the three townships that the cyclone went through.

This bill, as the gentleman will remember, provides for the cutting of this timber into lumber by the Indians on the reservations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any discretion vested in the Department?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state to the gentleman from Mississippi this bill was up under the suspension of the rule on Monday, and I was one of those who opposed it, and the gentleman has framed an amendment that covers the objection of those opposed to the bill at that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to this particular bill, but I want to give notice hereafter where in connection with matters of this sort a discretion is left in the Departments I shall object. There ought to be laws fixing these things, and there ought to be no discretion left in these Executive Departments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, this bill was up on a motion to suspend the rules on last suspension day. I objected to the passage of the bill as well as I could on that day, because I did not believe in the object of it. But after a discussion, such as could be had in the House, there not being a quorum present, a large proportion of those who were present voted in favor of suspending the rules. The bill would probably be passed on a suspension of the rules on the next suspension day, but to make the bill effective at all, if it has to go into force it ought to go into force as speedily as possible. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The title was amended.

The bill as amended was read a third time; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. MORSE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

GOVERNMENT OF CANAL ZONE.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN] presents a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interests, by what authority of law he has exercised the functions of government in the Panama Canal Zone since the date of the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, or by what right or authority the executive, legislative, and judicial functions in the Zone have been performed since that date.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield twenty minutes of the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is this submitted as a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. RYAN. A privileged report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does not inquire for fact, Mr. Speaker. The resolution directs the President to prepare a law brief for the Congress, justifying certain conduct he is supposed to have taken in relation to the government of the Panama Canal Zone. It is not an inquiry for fact at all. It asks the Chief Executive to give his opinion in respect to the law or to state his views of the law that justifies a certain course of government. I make the point of order that it is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The genleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] makes the point of order that the resolution is not privileged. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say on that point that the resolution is a resolution of inquiry, requesting the facts as to how the present government of the Canal Zone is conducted. The President of the United States, I understand, is willing, or ought to be willing, to give this information.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RYAN. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, pending the point of order I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the point of order, and pending the same, the resolution be considered now. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I do not want to consider it as a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, there is an old and well-established saying that "Every person who has power comes to the abuse of it." Lest it may be considered that the resolution now before the House deals with a mere dry or technical question, I wish to make it clear at the beginning of my remarks that I charge the President of the United States with exceeding his authority in the manner in which he has conducted the government of the Panama Canal Zone since the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress; and I charge the Republican majority of this House with negligence and carelessness in their conduct of the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit an inquiry?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would it not be far more appropriate to submit your charges against the Administration, or against the President, after the President has submitted his answer to the resolution of inquiry which the House is ready to adopt?

Mr. HARRISON. The President called for the opinion of the Attorney-General, which I am willing to submit to the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. I assume the gentleman from New York knows now what the answer of the President will be, and is discussing the answer in anticipation of what the answer will contain.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know, but I am quite ready to submit to the House the opinion of the Attorney-General upon which the President has acted.

Mr. TAWNEY. I submit that it would be more appropriate to discuss the report when the President sends his answer than to discuss the matter before the President has had an opportunity to answer.

Mr. HARRISON. The President proceeded upon the advice of the Attorney-General; and if the gentleman wishes, I am quite ready to have read before the House the advice of the Attorney-General upon which the President proceeded.

Now, this is a very anomalous condition in the Canal Zone. The President of our Republic is maintaining on American territory a little empire. Imperialism began in our history about the time of the war with Mexico, but it had not been contemplated by the founders of the Republic nor even by those who conducted the Government down to the most recent times that here, within the boundaries of our own territory, we should set up an imperium in imperio in times of profound peace. I will read for the instruction of the House the law under which the government of the Panama Canal Zone was established. This is the act of April 28, 1904, and reads:

That until the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, unless provision for a temporary government of the Canal Zone be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, as well as the power to make all rules and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone and all the rights, power, and authority granted by the terms of said treaty with the United States, shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct for the government of said Zone to maintain and protect the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

Now, at the time this measure passed the House it was advanced by those in charge of the measure that it followed the precedent established when the Louisiana purchase was made, and when the Florida purchase was made from Spain. Therefore they maintained that it was entirely proper for us to put the government of this new territory entirely into the hands of the President of the United States pending the formation by Congress of a suitable government for that territory. It was understood at the time when this measure went through the House that Congress would subsequently frame laws for the government of the Panama Canal Zone. That is why this delegation of power to the President was specifically limited. Now, returning to our historical precedent, that was what occurred after the Louisiana purchase and the acquisition of the territory of Florida. In each instance, within a year, a regular form of government was provided by Congress. Meanwhile in each case, express authority had to be given to the President to govern that territory until Congress established specific laws.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. With pleasure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that the Congress has not provided by law for the government of the Isthmian Canal, and therefore the President is censurable because Congress has neglected doing that?

Mr. HARRISON. I can answer that both yes and no. Congress has neglected up to the present doing that. And the President is continuing——

Mr. STAFFORD. Then wherein is the President censurable for continuing authority expressly granted by Congress, even if it has been the practice in cases of other acquisitions for the Congress at a certain time to provide necessary laws?

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman will allow me to develop my argument, I hope to answer that. I do not maintain that the President is censurable because he has continued to preserve law and order in the Panama Canal Zone, but I do maintain that the nature of the legislation formulated by Executive order and administered by those on the Canal Zone entirely exceeds his authority, and I do maintain that he is censurable for allowing this evil to exist and allowing government by Executive order to be continued.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Attorney-General has supported his position by reason of the delegation of the original power that gave him authority to administer the government of the Zone, as he is now doing.

Mr. HARRISON. I have said before that he had taken the advice of the Attorney-General, and I am quite prepared to have it read before the House, but in my humble judgment it does not entirely dispose of this thing in the way the gentleman seems to imagine.

There never was any justification or any precedent for giving the President the entire powers of government in this Canal Zone in the way it was done in the Fifty-eighth Congress. At the time of the Louisiana purchase it was necessary to give the President great powers like this, because the settlers along the Mississippi and Ohio rivers were almost at the point of war with the Spanish authorities at New Orleans over the right of deposit at the mouth of the river and the right of navigation of that river.

It was an act of military necessity, and anybody who has read the description of that day in New Orleans when the French flag was run down and the Stars and Stripes was unfolded beneath the blue sky of Louisiana, to be met by sullen looks and muttered threats from the crowd assembled on the plaza, will realize that it was more than an imaginary possibility that war might thereafter have immediately occurred.

Nobody, so far as I am aware, has maintained that there was any military necessity for giving the President this authority in the Panama Canal Zone. It was evidently intended by Congress that before the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress a code of law should be framed for the Canal Zone. Why it was not done will no doubt be explained to you by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I understand that it was due to a conflict of opinion between the two branches of this legislature as to the kind of government to give the Panama Canal Zone. However that may be, the situation was clearly understood by the people down there on the Canal Zone themselves.

In the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission for 1904, at page 70, the Commissioners thought that "until otherwise provided for by law" the status quo should be maintained.

In their report for 1905, on page 29, the report says:

After the publication of the Commissioners' last report and before the authority of the Commission to exercise legislative power ceased to exist, laws were passed, etc.

And on page 73, Governor Magoon says:

The situation requires the restoration of the legislative power granted by Congress in the act of April 28, 1904.

In other words, it was clear in the minds of the Canal Commission that their power of government granted by the Fifty-eighth Congress had expired, and that the Isthmian Canal Commission no longer had authority under the act of April 28, 1904, to govern the Zone.

The Attorney-General and not the Congress was thereupon consulted by the President, as to the President's right to continue to govern the Panama Canal Zone. I assume that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in reply to my remarks, will give you the gist of the Attorney-General's decision. Briefly speaking, it is that Congress on December 21, 1905, by giving the President authority to call upon the officials of the Panama Canal Zone for reports as to what they were doing in the government and construction of the canal, thereby continued the power given by the Fifty-eighth Congress to make legislation.

As to that I take issue. I maintain that whatever right or power the President had upon the Panama Canal Zone in the way of making laws, with no express extension of the rights given to him by the Fifty-eighth Congress, was merely the right of the Executive of a de facto government; that the analogy for this situation if any, must be found in a discussion of the military governments set up in our past history by the United States upon the acquisition of our new Territories, that such right does not extend to the enactment of substantive law; that such right, especially in the premises, does not extend to a repeal by the President of all measures of local autonomy or self-government established by the Isthmian Canal Commission during the Fifty-eighth Congress and under the authority of law. Here was no case of military necessity, but active legislation by an Executive in time of peace, after laws had already been established by Congress.

Now, the power of de facto governments in this country, although forming no precedent, in my opinion, evidently gave rise to this situation. Beginning with the Louisiana and Florida purchase, which I have already discussed, this power lay dormant until the time of the war with Mexico. The time of the strict constructionists had passed, and a different era had been inaugurated in the United States. The spirit of expansion was abroad; the blood of the American people was fired with the possibilities of the boundless West. In those times and under those conditions we entered upon our war with Mexico. We moved into the Territory of New Mexico and of California, and while there the military governors set up a form of government for those new Territories. I wish to make it perfectly plain that those were military governments and not civil governments; that although Governor Kearny——

Mr. CHANEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I understood him to say that imperialism began with the war with Mexico.

Does the gentleman mean by that to say that that is another of the Democratic planks that we have adopted in the administration of affairs?

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman is putting me, as a Democrat, upon two horns of a dilemma; but I have attempted to explain in the last few moments how the spirit of imperialism first seized the people of the United States, and I for one will say, as a Democratic Member of this House, that I would not give up a foot of territory gained by the United States. [Applause.] What I call "imperialism" in this discussion is imperialism in the government of our conquered territories, the holding of those territories with apparently no view to the future autonomy of the people there.

Now, if the gentleman will allow me to proceed. Governor Kearny, in New Mexico, established what he called a "permanent" form of government, although he was but a military governor. He attempted to set up a civil government, but the President especially disavowed any responsibility for or any approval of such an act. Presidents Polk and Taylor believed that with the conclusion of peace the military government thereupon must cease and that a de facto government was inaugurated ex necessitate rei. President Fillmore believed that even a de facto government terminated when the people of the Territory of New Mexico came together and framed a form of government for their own Territory. However that may be, it was all done under military government until the time when Congress stepped in and made a form of government for the Territory.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Is not the gentleman somewhat in error in respect to California?

Mr. HARRISON. I am about to come to California now.

Mr. KAHN. I thought I heard the gentleman mention the State of California.

Mr. HARRISON. In California there was what Admiral Stockton called a "civil government." So far as the means of communication of those days are concerned, California was a couple of months away from the seat of government at that time, and what went on there was not very strictly under the supervision of Congress. With all due respect to Admiral Stockton, the civil government which he set up was a sort of opera bouffe, and was destroyed by a rebellion in California within a few weeks.

Thereupon there were other attempts to form a civil government. There was a man commissioned by the military government to act as civil governor of California, but as a matter of fact, all the time it was nothing more than a military government, whatever they might choose to call it.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. KAHN. As a matter of fact the military government suggested that a State convention be called for the purpose of framing a constitution. That convention met, they framed a constitution, and all the officers for the State were elected under that constitution, and the military governor turned over all power to that State government. That State government was in full force when Congress, on the 9th of September, 1850, admitted the State into the Union.

Mr. HARRISON. The statement of the gentleman from California is correct. I merely contend that the government was maintained by the military and derived all its power from the military, although it was called a civil government. And upon that I wish to read to you a decision of the United States Supreme Court in a case considered by them which goes to the essence of the whole matter. This is the case of the Admittance, an American vessel, in the United States Supreme Court.

The courts established or sanctioned in Mexico during the war by the commander of the American forces were nothing more than the agents of the military power to assist it in preserving order in the conquered territory and to protect the inhabitants in their persons and property while it was occupied by the American arms. They were subject to the military power and their decisions under its control whenever the commanding officer thought fit to interfere. They were not courts of the United States and had no right to adjudicate upon a question of prize or no prize. And the sentence of condemnation in the court at Monterey is a nullity and can have no effect upon the rights of any party.

Now to proceed with the question of the acquisition of territory. Hawaii was annexed by joint resolution. In terms it was provided that five commissioners should go to Hawaii and attempt to frame a code of laws to be adopted by Congress. These five commissioners proceeded to Hawaii to investigate the situation and to ascertain, if possible, what kind of laws would suit the persons there.

About two years elapsed before enactment by Congress of the code for Hawaii. In the meantime President McKinley, far from attempting imperial powers over Hawaii, specifically refused, referring to the refusal in his third annual message, to allow any disposition of public lands in Hawaii to be made or any election to be held giving political rights to the people there. This was a strict construction that would have suited the days when the west Florida debates were in this House. It would have met the views of those who debated the form of government to be established in the Louisiana Purchase, but it was not the status assumed by the same President when we took control of the Philippine Islands. Now, the state of affairs in the Philippine Islands is assumed by those who have discussed this subject to answer the contention that imperial powers in the hands of the President have throughout our history only been granted as an act of military necessity and pending the establishment in the territory of a government framed by Congress. It is said in answer to this that the first Philippine Commission that went from Washington to the Philippines to establish a civil government there did so while the military was still in the islands.

That is entirely true, but the members of that Commission went down there instructed by the President that the military was in power, their authority was to be respected until relieved by act of Congress, that the Commissioners were not to interfere with them and were to look to and ascertain what laws would probably be advisable when Congress came to act. Now, acting under that authority the civil commission of the Philippines was merely an advisory board, although laws recommended by them were promulgated by the military until the partial establishment of peace in those islands. At that time Governor Taft was there, and Congress thereupon, under the Spooner Act, specifically authorized the President to assume the control and government of those islands until Congress should further act, and Governor Taft was inaugurated as the first civil governor of the Philippines; and, moreover, in the Spooner Act Congress specifically ratified all acts of the administration and the military governor up to that time in the islands. That disposes, in my opinion, of the suggestion that the "insular cases" have any bearing upon the question of the present anomalous condition in the Panama Canal Zone.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RYAN. I yield ten more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that none of the military or de facto governments of the United States in newly acquired territories furnish any precedent for the present condition of affairs in the Canal Zone. Here a civil government had been established by Congress, and lapsed by expiration of time; and yet the Executive has continued to make or break laws at will.

The old theory of government was that as soon as a country incorporated any new territory the boundaries of the old country opened up and let in the new territory as part and parcel of the old, subject to its laws and to its Government. No student of the United States Constitution will maintain for a moment that that position is tenable here, or ever has been in the United States. On the contrary, a specific enactment of laws is and always has been necessary for any territory which we might secure by conquest or otherwise. A general principle adopted by the military governor was always to suspend for the time being the political laws which he might find in the new territory, but to administer all local laws, until Congress could act and establish a regular form of government.

Now, the action of the military governors of our new possessions, subsequently ratified by Congress, forms no precedent for the enactment of substantive law by the President to-day on the Canal Zone, especially since the course of the President there has been to repeal legislation theretofore enacted by the Isthmian Canal Commission under authority of Congress. I do not wish to be understood as saying that I disapprove of any of the laws which the President has enacted on the Panama Canal Zone. They are excellent laws, the very best that could be made, but the only pity is that the President did not leave it to Congress to do instead of doing it himself.

I am going to read briefly the titles of the more recent Executive orders, promulgating laws down there on the Zone. On November 17, 1906, there is a new organic act for a commission, creating a general counsel as administrative head, instead of the former governor of the Zone. Here is a new marriage law, promulgated by the President "under authority of law vested in me." Here is another Executive order, of March 13, 1907, "under authority vested in me by law"—what law and what authority, I would like to know?—"it is ordered that the following amendments be made to the penal code."

Among other things, grand larceny is fixed when the property is of the value of $10 and upward, and embezzlement of the property of the United States or of the Canal Commission is made punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not more than ten years, which seems to me to impose a considerable discretion in the judge. Here is a new immigration law for the Zone, which is chiefly remarkable because it contains some of the simplified spelling which we applaud so much. Here is an Executive order of March 13, 1907, and this I consider particularly important abolishing municipal government on the Zone and replacing it with four administrative districts, each ruled over by a tax collector. The first Isthmian Canal Commission established on the Zone five municipal districts. It was the intention of Congress, as expressed by the Executive, to give the people of the Panama Canal Zone as much autonomy as was consistent with their nature and with the surroundings. Here, of his own motion, the President abolishes it all. "By authority vested in me by law"—what law?—the President has destroyed all forms of local autonomy, and has set up four administrative districts, presided over by tax collectors. Here is another Executive order—one of January 6, 1908—reorganizing and defining the duties of the Commission. That is all right; it probably makes for the betterment of the Commission. Here is another one of January 9, 1908, establishing three judicial circuits. That is purely technical. Here is another one making begging, vagrancy, and drunkenness misdemeanors.

Here is another one authorizing common carriers to sell articles left in their possession, and here is one of February 6, 1908, which is of the greatest importance, establishing jury trials in criminal cases in the Panama Canal Zone. Where the person accused considers it desirable he may be tried under the old system, but if he desires he may now be tried under the American jury system. There is a man down there now who was sentenced to death nearly a year ago, who was tried by a judge of the Panama court sitting down there, with two assistant judges of the small municipal courts. This man was tried and condemned to death by three judges under the old Spanish system, and this aroused so much abhorrence and so much disgust in the United States that this new Executive order was promulgated, establishing trial by a jury in criminal cases. Now, these are good laws. They are all important and satisfactory, excepting, in my opinion, the one which abolished local self-government, but it was not within the President's prerogative or privileges by Executive order to enact any of these substantive laws in time of peace.

His representatives are not down there as military governors, nor has the authority given to him by the Fifty-eighth Congress extended beyond the life of that Congress. When that Congress delegated authority to legislate to the President that authority expired with the Fifty-eighth Congress by express limitation, and on the closing day of that Congress the House of Representatives extended to the time of the meeting of the Fifty-ninth Congress only the power to make use of the appropriations theretofore made for the Isthmian Canal Commission. Then, upon the assemblage of a new Congress, nothing was done, except that the House did recognize, on December 21, 1905, the fact that a de facto government existed down there by allowing the President to call for reports from those who were governing the Canal Zone.

We all recognize that there must be some form of government on the Zone or anarchy will prevail, and the President is within his rights and authority in maintaining a government down there, but I insist that under all the authorities and from all the historic precedents of this country, the President has no right and no authority to enact substantive law, nor has he any right or authority to abolish laws which had been theretofore established upon the Zone by the Isthmian Canal Commission acting as the servants and with the authority of the Congress of the United States.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, in the development of imperialism some of the finer sensibilities of the American people are becoming blunted. When we overlook the sacredness of self-government, when we intrust to a man whose imperial tendencies are only too well known all rights and authority over the life, liberty, and happiness of many thousands of people, when we do it simply because we are derelict ourselves in passing new laws to meet the situation, this seems to me to be an occasion for which America may be ashamed. Now, I am asked, What was the President to do? He was to do two things. In the first place, he was not to enact laws by Executive order and without authority; and in the second place, a little more healthy use of the big stick would have resulted in the enactment by Congress of legislation specifically covering this question in the Panama Canal Zone. One further thing. I realize that the most important thing to be done by the Panama Canal Commission is to dig the canal——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRISON. I ask one minute in order to complete the sentence.

Mr. RYAN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. The important thing in the Canal Zone is to dig the canal. We have no desire to embarrass the Administration in that matter, but we have a desire to see that, so far as possible, all the people who are now under the broad ægis of the American Government will have so much of self-government as is possible for this Congress to give them, and that they shall not be left to the care of a civil dictator simply because the Congress is slipshod and careless in not remedying this evil. I for one regret that it became possible for the President to be put in this situation, but I regret that, being in this situation, he did not right the wrong and did not insist upon having the Congress enact a form of government for the Panama Canal Zone. [Applause.]

Mr. RYAN. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois how much time he desires?

Mr. MANN. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. RYAN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to defend the President. He needs no defense. I rise only to state the facts and to compliment and praise the President. An emergency confronted him, and he met it fully and fairly within his constitutional prerogatives.

Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] introduced his resolution he doubtless believed that the President was acting without constitutional authority in the government of the Canal Zone. I have listened with interest to his remarks and I am inclined to believe that he now thinks the President has acted wholly within his constitutional authority in carrying on the Canal Zone. In my opinion, the President is not entitled to receive any censure, but, on the contrary, to every meed of praise for his conduct of government in the Zone.

We acquired the Canal Zone and by legislation directed the President to take possession of the territory. If we had enacted no further legislation, that would have unquestionably given to the President the authority to carry on the government of the Zone. It would have been either government or anarchy. It could not be presumed that Congress when it directed the President to acquire and take possession of the territory intended to turn the inhabitants there over to a condition of anarchy. It must be presumed that the Congress intended the President to preserve law and order. Congress did enact in 1904 the provision authorizing the President—following the old law concerning the Louisiana purchase—until the end of the Fifty-eighth Congress to govern the Zone. No further legislation has been had by Congress since, except at the beginning of the Fifty-ninth Congress we directed the persons in authority in the Zone, under the direction of the President, to make certain reports and estimates to Congress. The President was met with a situation that by direction of Congress he had taken possession of the territory of the Zone, and there Congress paused. It did not direct him by what method he should govern the Zone. It left the President to govern the Zone under his authority or let anarchy prevail upon the Zone. It may be, although I doubt it, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] would have had the President keep his hands off the government and let anarchy prevail.

I appeal with confidence to every right-thinking man of this country, regardless of party or partisanship, whether that person would believe it the duty of the President of the United States to govern the Zone, or to let anarchy prevail where we were endeavoring to carry on a great work of construction. Without government it is impossible to carry on the work of construction.

The President submitted the matter to the Attorney-General of the United States, who, in a long opinion, which I shall ask leave to print in the RECORD, upon another long statement of the case by the counsel for the Isthmian Canal, advised the President that he not only had the power to govern the Zone—that it not only was his duty under his constitutional authority to govern it, but in the necessary exercise of that authority he also had the power to change from time to time the law which might be prevailing upon the Zone. He has exercised that power in a way which no one criticises. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] criticises his assuming power to exercise the right of change of law, but does not criticise the law which has been changed. Does the gentleman from New York undertake to criticise the President because he provides that upon the Zone there shall be a jury trial in certain cases? Does the gentleman from New York criticise the President because a man was sentenced to be hung without a jury trial, or because the President now provides that a man can not be sentenced to be hung without a jury trial? Which dilemma does the gentleman from New York take? In one breath he was criticising the sentencing of a man to be hung without a trial, and in the next breath criticising the President for changing the law so that the man might have a trial by jury.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that connection, does the gentleman think the President did any more, when he declared that he should not be hung without a jury trial, than to declare that the Constitution of the United States, guaranteeing the right of trial by jury, applied to the Zone? Therefore in that particular case did the President make a law or merely declare that the fundamental law of the United States applied to the Zone?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly clear, I think, in the opinion of anyone who has given special study to the subject, that the Constitution of the United States does not apply to the Canal Zone. I believe there is no question about that on either side of the aisle.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask another question.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Constitution of the United States does not apply to the Canal Zone, then how is it possible for the President himself, a creature of the Constitution, to apply it to the Canal Zone?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, on that matter I refer to the decisions in the Porto Rico and Philippine cases. It may be a long process of reasoning, but it is plain enough for me to understand that, while the President is controlled by the Constitution, certain territory which he may control is not covered by the Constitution. That is a plain proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman admits that the President is controlled by the Constitution, although he denies that the Zone is. Now, I will ask the gentleman these two questions in one: First, what part of the Constitution confers upon the President of the United States the legislative power; and, secondly, what part of the Constitution confers upon Congress the power to confer upon the President legislative power?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have discussed these matters a good many times. I discussed this very identical matter with the gentleman from Mississippi when we passed other of these canal bills, I believe, for which he finally voted, although I am not quite sure about that. It is too long a proposition for me to enter upon, that kind of an academic discussion, and it is purely an academic discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman admits that the President is bound even in the Canal Zone by the Constitution. That is all I want.

Mr. MANN. I think that the Executive, that is created by the Constitution, is bound at all times, as the gentleman is, in his official capacity, by the Constitution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, not desiring to delay the House, I simply wish to say that in this connection the President met the situation with that degree of good judgment which he has always exercised in dealing with a difficult proposition, and for what he has done we ought to give to him the credit which the people give generally to him upon questions. In his government of the Canal Zone and in connection with our Government there he has reflected honor upon himself and credit upon our Republic.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter of the counsel of the Isthmian Canal, the letter or opinion of the Attorney-General, the various Executive orders which have been made by the President with reference to the Canal Zone, not including the order putting into effect the Code of Civil Procedure, which is a bound volume of something over 200 pages that simplifies the law there. I ask unanimous consent to have these documents printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The papers are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 30, 1907.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 21st instant, submitting for my opinion "the question whether by section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904, the President, as distinguished from the Isthmian Canal Commission, is prohibited from putting into effect by Executive order needed rules and regulations for the government of the Canal Zone, and, as a corollary thereto, whether he has lost the power to modify any rules and regulations established by the Isthmian Canal Commission prior to the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress."

To answer this question it is necessary to consider the section of the act mentioned in your letter immediately preceding the one to which you especially refer. This section (section 1) of the said act, so far as it is material to the present question, is as follows:

"That the President is hereby authorized, upon the acquisition of the property of the New Panama Canal Company and the payment to the Republic of Panama of the $10,000,000 provided by article 14 of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 26th day of February, 1904, to be paid to the latter Government, to take possession of and occupy on behalf of the United States the Zone of land and land under water of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed thereon, which said Zone begins in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extends to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to the distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, and also of all islands within said Zone, and in addition thereto the group of islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco, and, from time to time, of any lands and waters outside of said Zone which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said Canal, or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said enterprise, the use, occupation, and control whereof were granted to the United States by article 2 of said treaty."

Articles 2 and 3 of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama mentioned in this section are in the terms following:

"ART. II. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a Zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said Canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the central line of the route of the Canal to be constructed; the said Zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the Zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the Zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal, or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.

"The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the Zone above described, and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

"ART. III. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the Zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority."

It appears from these sections that the United States acquired in perpetuity "the use, occupation, and control" of the so-called "Canal Zone" and also "all the rights, power, and authority within the Zone mentioned * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory." Unquestionably these provisions of the treaty imposed upon the United States the obligations as well as the powers of a sovereign within the territory described, and it is no less obvious that among these obligations was that of providing a government for the territory in question; for the purpose, in the language of the second section of the act of Congress approved April 28, 1904, of "maintaining and protecting the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion." This obligation has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in repeated decisions, among which I need only refer to American Insurance Company v. Canter (1 Peters, 512) and Cross v. Harrison (16 Howard, 164).

It being, therefore, the duty of the United States to provide a government for the territory over which its control, with all the incidents of sovereignty, was established by the terms of the treaty, in the absence of any provision by Congress to effect this object, the President would be authorized and obliged, by his duty as Executive head of the nation under the Constitution, to discharge the obligation thus resting upon the nation; and if Congress had taken no action whatever on the subject, the right of the President to thus administer the territory controlled by the nation would not be open to question. In fact, however, Congress, by the first section of the act above noted, authorized the President "to take possession of and occupy on behalf of the United States" the territory generally known as the "Canal Zone" and covered by the terms of the treaty. This authority to take possession of and occupy would of itself imply the authority to govern, in so far as government was needful to secure the safety and welfare of the inhabitants of the territory occupied, whether such inhabitants dwelt there at the time of its cession or came there for lawful purposes and with the consent of the United States afterwards.

The second section of the act approved April 28, 1904, which is particularly mentioned in your letter, is as follows:

"That until the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the Canal Zone be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, as well as the power to make all rules and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and all the rights, powers, and authority granted by the terms of said treaty to the United States shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct for the government of said Zone and maintaining and protecting the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion."

In my opinion, this provision is to be considered as declaratory only of what would have been the rights and duties of the President if it had not been enacted. It is true that by its terms its effect is limited to the duration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, but I do not understand this as meaning that Congress intended the Canal Zone to be without any legal government after the period fixed. Such a conclusion would be, in my opinion, wholly inadmissible, in view of the universally recognized duty on the part of any civilized power to provide a government for all territory under its control; and the limitation of time mentioned in this section must be interpreted, in my opinion, as inserted merely to show that, during the period of its own lawful existence, and unless led to hold differently by succeeding events, the Fifty-eighth Congress intended that the powers of government, which it might have lawfully exercised over the Canal Zone, should be exercised, by its authority and under its delegation, by the President or such officers or persons as he might employ for the purpose. That Congress did not intend, or expect, the President's authority over the Canal Zone to end at the time mentioned in the second section of the act approved April 28, 1904, seems clear by the provision in the act approved December 21, 1905 (34 Stats., 5), making appropriations to continue the construction of the canal, to the effect that "the President shall annually cause to be made by the persons appointed and employed by him in charge of the government of said Canal Zone * * * estimates of expenditures." By this provision Congress recognized the President as authorized to govern the Canal Zone and appoint and employ persons to take part in that government. Evidently, then, Congress did not consider the power expressly conferred upon the President by section 2 of the act of Congress approved April 28, 1904, as terminating at the time mentioned in that section.

In the case of Wilson v. Shaw, recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, several acts of Congress are referred to as ratifying, by recognition, previous acts of the Executive in the acquisition of the Canal Zone and the construction of the canal. If it were necessary to do so, the terms of the act approved December 1, 1905, above quoted, might be relied upon as a ratification by Congress of the President's assumption of authority over the Canal Zone subsequently to the end of the Fifty-eighth Congress. In my opinion, however, no such ratification was necessary; and, in the absence of action by Congress distinctly denying him that right and establishing by law a state of anarchy in the Canal Zone, the President would have the power to administer this territory merely because control, with the incidents of sovereignty, over it was possessed by the United States, and no other provision for its orderly government had been made.

It is hardly necessary to add that this authority on his part involves the right and the power to modify or repeal any laws previously existing within this territory, whether originally enacted before or after its acquisition by the United States. Laws, whatever their form, continue in force after the authority which enacted them has ceased to exist only by the consent of the succeeding authority to their continuing validity implied from its failure to modify or repeal them; so soon as the new governing power considers them no longer appropriate to attain the ends of government, it has the inherent right to change or annul them, unless its authority in this respect has been expressly curtailed. There is nothing in the act approved April 28, 1904, or in any other act of Congress relating to this subject-matter, which discloses any purpose on the part of the Congress to give to determinations of the Isthmian Canal Commission a peculiar permanency, or to exempt them from modification or rescission in the discretion of the President.

I therefore answer your question in the negative, and advise you that, in my opinion, the President may now, directly or through the persons appointed and employed by him to govern the Zone and build the canal, adopt needed rules and regulations for the government of the Canal Zone, and that he has not lost the power to modify any of the rules and regulations established by the Canal Commission prior to the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Respectfully,

CHARLES J. BONAPARTE,
Attorney-General.

JANUARY 4, 1907.

SIR: In order to facilitate the construction of the Isthmian Canal, it has become important to put into effect at once certain rules and regulations for the government of the Canal Zone upon subjects not now covered by any formal legislation, and to modify in certain respects the existing rules and regulations decreed by the Isthmian Canal Commission prior to the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

To illustrate: There is at the present time no law or decree in force allowing marriages to be celebrated by Protestant ministers; allowing mortgages and transfers of real property to be properly recorded; making the embezzlement of Government property a crime, or the desertion of wife and children a misdemeanor; there is no adequate code of civil procedure; and the organization of the police courts is in many respects unsatisfactory.

Upon the other hand, certain rules and regulations passed by the Commission prior to the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress threw into disorder the whole subject of police, sanitary, and fiscal administration in so far as they depend upon and are supported by ordinances prescribing offenses and fixing penalties. Owing to a regulation passed by the old Commission within the period named it is scarcely a matter of doubt that many of the current ordinances regulating the raising of revenues, the conduct of saloons, dance halls, and public resorts, and the entire subject of nuisances and sanitary protection, are invalid. Other subjects might be mentioned, including that of salaries, many of which were fixed by regulations of the old Commission and have since been increased or lowered in the administration of the Commission's affairs. The cases mentioned, however, are sufficiently typical to present the question which I now submit for your consideration—that is to say, whether the President, as distinguished from the Commission, has not full power to put in effect all necessary rules and regulations relating to these subjects which are so intimately connected with the construction of the canal and the maintenance of law and order upon the Isthmus.

By section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904, it is provided—

"That until the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the Canal Zone be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, as well as the power to make all rules and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and all the rights, powers, and authority granted by the terms of said treaty to the United States shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct for the government of said Zone and maintaining and protecting the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion."

It is doubtful whether the Commission itself, to whom, under this act, at one time the President had authority to delegate his powers, can now legislate upon the subjects above mentioned. It has, however, been assumed—a view in which a number of eminent lawyers upon the Isthmus have concurred—that although under the terms of the above provision the President no longer has authority to delegate to the Commission his inherent powers to provisionally govern the external territory known as the "Canal Zone," which he holds in trust for the people of the United States pending Congressional action, he has not himself been deprived of that power, and may, therefore, until the Congress affirmatively act upon the matter, pass such rules and regulations as are required to promote the construction of the canal and to maintain law and order upon the Isthmus. This conclusion may be said to rest upon the following considerations:

The right of the President to administer territory held through a military occupation or by treaty cession pending the establishment of a temporary government by the Congress arises ex necessitate rei, that a condition of anarchy may not prevail—a necessity which, in the absence of Congressional action, equally exists in the Canal Zone to-day.

Similar powers have been exercised by the President with respect to Louisiana (2 Stats., 245), with respect to New Mexico (Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 20 How., 176), with respect to California (Cross v. Harrison, 16 How., 164), with respect even to domestic territory occupied by Federal troops (The Grapeshot, 9 Wall., 129), with respect to Porto Rico (Dooley v. United States, 182 U. S., 222), and with respect to the Philippine Islands (32 Stats., 691, sec. 1; Dorr v. United States, 195 U. S., 138). The power has usually been derived from the war powers of the President, but it seems to be equally a part of the treaty-making power. Thus, in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 244, 279) the court declared that the power to acquire territory by treaty implied the power to govern such territory; and in the same case Mr. Justice Gray (p. 345) declared that, "in conquered territory, government must take effect either by the treaty-making power or by that of the Congress of the United States."

Nor does the power of the President to legislate, whether it be derived from his war powers or the treaty-making power, cease with the mere military occupation.

In Downes v. Bidwell (p. 346) it was said by Justice Gray:

"In the absence of Congressional legislation the regulation of the revenues of the conquered territory, even after the treaty of cession, remains with the executive and military power."

Cross v. Harrison (16 How., 164, 192) is clear upon this point. Speaking with respect to the Territory of California, the court said:

"The Territory had been ceded as a conquest, and was to be preserved and governed as such until the sovereignty to which it had passed had legislated for it. That sovereignty was the United States, under the Constitution, by which power had been given to Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with the power also to admit new States into this Union, with only such limitations as are expressed in the section in which this power is given. The government, of which Colonel Mason was the executive, had its origin in the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered territory. It had been instituted during the war by the command of the President of the United States. It was the government when the territory was ceded as a conquest, and it did not cease, as a matter of course, or as a necessary consequence of the restoration of peace. The President might have dissolved it by withdrawing the Army and Navy officers who administered it, but he did not do so. Congress could have put an end to it, but that was not done. The right inference from the inaction of both is that it was meant to be continued until it had been legislatively changed."

In Leitensdorfer v. Webb (20 How., 176) dealing with the Territory of New Mexico, it was decided that the Executive authority of the United States properly established a provisional government which ordained laws and instituted a judicial system, all of which continued in force after the termination of the war and until modified by direct legislation of Congress or by the Territorial government established by its authority.

The case of the Philippine Islands is perhaps the most obvious precedent. The Philippine Islands were acquired by cession under the treaty of Paris, executed December 10, 1898, and ratified April 11, 1899. The government of those islands was at first purely military, but civil government, with legislative powers, was established by Executive decree, dated April 7, 1900. It was not until March 2, 1901, that Congress specifically declared the civil power to govern the Philippines to vest in the President, and not until July 1, 1902 (32 Stats., 691), that a temporary civil government was established by an act of Congress, and in that act the establishment of a civil government by Executive order was fully approved.

The power of the Congress and of the President with respect to the administration of the outlying territory of the United States is in many respects analogous. In both cases it is best founded upon the great law of necessity. This doctrine was early announced in Sere v. Pitot (6 Cranch, 332), where Chief Justice Marshall declared that "The power of governing and legislating for territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and to hold territory." See likewise Dorr v. United States (195 U. S., 138, 140). It has, indeed, long been a question whether the Congress, with respect to such outlying territory, has, under the Constitution, any express power of government. In Dred Scott v. Sandford (19 How., 293, 441) it was held that section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution, providing that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," was not intended to apply "to territory which the Government might afterwards obtain from a foreign nation." Although in subsequent decisions the power of Congress with respect to outlying territories seems to have been sometimes attributed to the territorial clause, Scott v. Sandford has not been expressly overruled upon this point, and the conclusion of Justice Brown in De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 196), that this power is derived "not necessarily from the territorial clause of the Constitution, but from the necessities of the case and from the inability of the States to act upon the subject," is perhaps the most satisfactory statement of the law. But while the respective powers of Congress and the President may be said to be analogous with reference to their source, no conflict can exist between the two departments. The functions of the President with respect to recently acquired territory precede intervention by Congress, and terminate when Congress affirmatively acts; but not until then. During the period of Congressional inaction the President may exercise powers that are at least equal to the necessities of the case (Justice Brown in Dooley v. United States, 182 U. S., pp. 2, 3, 4), and may extend to a modification of all existing laws (Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 20 Wallace, 176, 177).

In Downes v. Bidwell, Mr. Justice Gray says:

"The civil government of the United States can not extend immediately, and of its own force, over territory acquired by war. Such territory must necessarily, in the first instance, be governed by the military power under the control of the President, as Commander in Chief. Civil government can not take effect at once, as soon as possession is acquired under military authority, or even as soon as that possession is confirmed by treaty. It can only be put in operation by the action of the appropriate political department of the Government, at such time and in such degree as that department may determine. There must of necessity be a transition period."

The "transition period" of which the learned justice speaks still prevails in the Canal Zone, and, in the absence of any affirmative Congressional legislation whatsoever upon the subject, the powers of the President would still seem to be adequate to the enactment of whatever rules and regulations are necessary to establish an effective administration of the law.

It being entirely clear that the President was authorized to acquire the Canal Zone, and "jurisdiction to make such police and sanitary rules and regulations as shall be necessary to preserve order and preserve the public health thereof" (act of June 28, 1902), and the police powers, it should be observed, have been held to be "nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty to the extent of his dominions" (License Cases, 5 How., 504, 583), or the "particular right of a government," as expressed in Railway Company v. Smith (173 U. S., 684, 689), it follows that he had full powers to establish therein a provisional form of government which should be effective until Congress should itself establish as a substitute therefor a temporary form of government.

Section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904, can not be deemed to destroy or to diminish this power, inasmuch as such a construction, in the absence of the establishment by Congress of any form of government, would utterly destroy the President's right to maintain law and order upon the Zone, and would in effect incapacitate him from his very duty of constructing the canal, with which he is expressly charged by the Congress. That section must receive a reasonable interpretation, and no other reasonable interpretation seems possible than that the act merely intended to restrict to a limited time the President's authority to delegate to the Canal Commission his admitted powers of legislation. At the expiration of that time, although the power of the President to delegate this power might be deemed under the terms of this act to have ceased, his own original powers nevertheless remained intact.

It can not be contended that the grant to the President during a certain period of time of authority to delegate the powers of government, or even to exercise them in such manner as he deemed fit, was inconsistent with the continued existence of those powers in the President independently of such grant, or that it operated as a limitation upon powers which he might otherwise possess. This contention has, indeed, been often advanced when Congress has ratified or approved acts which without such ratification or approval would have been valid, but has never been seriously regarded. In Lincoln v. United States (202 U. S., 484, 499), in reply to a similar argument, the court declared: "The instances are many where Congress, out of abundant caution, has ratified what did not need, or what was afterwards found out not to have needed, ratification." The mere fact, therefore, that the act of April 28, 1904, by implication may seem to confer upon the President the power to legislate, does not mean that in the judgment of Congress that power did not otherwise exist, nor does it express the design of Congress to restrict or limit a power which it has always conceded.

To place a construction upon this section that would deprive the President of his long-established power to administer government in territory acquired with Congressional approval, pending the establishment of at least a temporary form of government by Congress, leads at once to an absurdity. The act provides that until March 4, 1905, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, as well as the power to make all rules and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, shall be vested in such person or persons as the President shall direct. A literal construction of this clause, making it an absolute limitation upon the previously existing Presidential power, and terminating that power outright, would inevitably lead to the conclusion that the government of the Canal Zone is still vested in the person or persons designated by the President to exercise governmental powers prior to March 4, 1905, and can at the present time be vested in no other persons whatsoever. Inasmuch as very few of the persons who discharged the military, civil, and judicial powers in the Canal Zone by express direction of the President prior to March 4, 1905, remain in office, there could be no persons to-day upon whom the powers previously exercised by them could be legally devolved. Is it not therefore clear that the necessity of the case, as well as the language of the statute itself, inevitably points to the conclusion that the limitation of time contained in the act of April 28, 1904, was intended to apply only to the President's power to delegate to others his rights to pass rules and regulations for administering the law in the Canal Zone, and not to destroy his inherent rights—a part of his constitutional duty, indeed—to pass all such necessary rules and regulations, or else that the act is merely a confirmatory act which, at least so far as the President acting directly is concerned, neither adds to nor subtracts from his previously existing powers?

If the President has authority to decree necessary rules and regulations for the administration of law and government within the Canal Zone, this right would necessarily involve the right to set aside a rule and regulation passed by his deputies; for otherwise his deputies would have exercised a power superior to that of the source from which the power was derived.

The act of April 28, 1904, it is therefore submitted in conclusion, should be regarded either as not covering the case submitted at all, or as merely a confirmatory and enabling act, and be construed accordingly.

Very respectfully,

RICHD. REID ROGERS,
General Counsel.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

The Executive order of April 1, 1905, is hereby changed as follows:

The Commission will hold quarterly sessions the first week in February, May, August, and November, of each year, on the Isthmus of Panama, and will continue each session as long as public business may require. Further notice of such meetings shall not be necessary to their regularity. The Commission may hold special sessions at the call of the Chairman. Four members shall constitute a quorum and the action of such majority shall be the action of the Commission.

The Commission, under the supervision of the Secretary of War and subject to the approval of the President, is charged with the general duty of the adoption of plans for the construction and maintenance of the Canal, and with the execution of the work of the same; for the purchase and delivery of supplies, machinery and necessary plant; the employment of the necessary officers, employees and laborers, and with the fixing of their salaries and wages; with the operations of the Panama Railroad Company and Steamship Lines as common carriers; with the utilization of the Panama Railroad as means of constructing the Canal; with the Government and Sanitation of the Canal Zone and with all matters of sanitation in the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors thereof; with the making of all contracts for the construction of the Canal or any of its needful accessories; and with all other matters incident and necessary to the building of a water-way across the Isthmus of Panama, as provided by the Act of Congress. June 28, 1902.

The Executive Committee, as provided for in my Executive Order of April 1st, 1905, is hereby abolished.

In order to promote the greatest harmony between the heads of Departments, and to secure results by the most direct methods, the following organization shall be created:

The organization shall consist of the Chairman and the following heads of Departments: Chief Engineer, General Counsel, Chief Sanitary Officer, General Purchasing Officer, General Auditor, Disbursing Officer, and Manager of Labor and Quarters. The duties of each shall be as follows:

1. The Chairman shall have charge of all Departments incident and necessary to the construction of the Canal or any of its accessories.
2. He shall appoint the Heads of the various Departments, subject to the approval of the Commission.
3. The Head of each Department shall report to and receive his instructions from the Chairman.
4. He shall have charge of the operations of the Panama Railroad and Steamship Lines.
5. He shall perform such other duties as may be assigned to him from time to time by the Secretary of War.

A minute of every transaction of the Chairman shall be made and one copy of the minutes shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War and another copy transmitted for the consideration of the Commission at its next meeting.

The Chief Engineer shall have charge of:

1. All engineering work relating to the Canal and its accessories.
2. All construction work on the Isthmus of Panama.
3. The operation of the Panama Railroad so far as same relates to Canal construction work.
4. The custody of all the supplies and plant of the Commission upon the Isthmus.
5. In the absence of the Chairman from the Isthmus, the Chief Engineer shall act for him in all matters requiring prompt attention, such action to be reported to the Chairman for his action, but the action of the Chief Engineer shall be in full force and effect until disapproved by the Chairman.

The General Counsel shall have charge of:

1. All legal matters pertaining to the Commission, whether in the United States or on the Isthmus of Panama.
2. The administration of civil government within the Canal Zone, and shall exercise, through a local administrator, the authority heretofore vested in the Governor of the Canal Zone.

The Chief Sanitary Officer shall have charge of:

1. All matters of sanitation within the Canal Zone, and also in the cities of Panama and Colon, and the harbors, etc., so far as authorized by the treaty, Executive Orders and decrees of December 3, 1904, between the United States and Panama, relating thereto.
2. The custody of all medical supplies needed for sanitary purposes.

The General Purchasing Officer shall have charge of the purchase and delivery of all supplies, machinery, and necessary plant.

The General Auditor shall have charge of the general bookkeeping, of property accounts, of statistics, of administrative audit of the Commission, and of the accounting, bookkeeping, and audit of the Government of the Canal Zone.

The Disbursing Officer shall have charge of time keeping, of preparation of pay rolls and vouchers, and of payment of same.

The Manager of Labor and Quarters shall have charge of the employment of all necessary labor secured from the West India Islands or Central and South American countries; of the general personal records of all employees; of all quarters, and shall assign same to all employees of the Commission or of its contractors; and of the operation of all Commission hotels and mess houses.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS.

All officers and employees shall be appointed, and their salaries shall be fixed, by the Head of the Department in which they are engaged. Their appointment and salaries shall be subject to the approval either of the Commission, or, if the Commission is not in session, of the Chairman.

The employment of laborers where the contract of employment is made in the United States, shall be negotiated and concluded by the Chairman of the Commission. Where the employment of laborers is effected upon the Isthmus, or outside of the United States, it shall be conducted under the supervision of the Chief Engineer, subject to the approval of the Chairman.

CONTRACTS.

Contracts for the purchase of supplies, involving an estimated expenditure exceeding $10,000 shall only be made after due public advertisement in newspapers of general circulation, and shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, except in the case of emergency, when, with the approval of the Secretary of War, advertising may be dispensed with. In the making of contracts for supplies or construction involving an estimated expenditure of more than $1,000, and less than $10,000, competitive bids should be secured by invitation or advertisement whenever practicable.

REPORTS.

The Head of each Department shall make a report upon the work and operation of his Department to the Isthmian Canal Commission from time to time and as often as may be required by the Chairman of the Commission.

The Chairman of the Commission will make a report to the Secretary of War, setting forth the results accomplished by each Department of the work, at least annually and as often as he may deem advisable or the Secretary may require.

The Secretary of War will make to the President a report at least annually, and as often as he may deem advisable or the President may require.

All Executive orders relating to the subject of the Panama Canal, excepting so far as they may be inconsistent with the present order, remain in force.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Effective this date, Nov. 17, 1906.

T. R.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law it is ordered:

That marriages in the Canal Zone may be celebrated by any minister of the Gospel in regular standing in the church or society to which he belongs, by the judge of any court of record, or by any municipal or district judge.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 13, 1907.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law it is ordered:

1. The Canal Zone, Isthmus of Panama, shall be divided into four administrative districts, to be known as Ancon, Emperador, Gorgona, and Cristobal. The districts of Ancon and Emperador shall be coextensive with the present municipal districts of Ancon and Emperador. The district of Gorgona shall be composed of the present municipal district of Gorgona and that portion of the municipal district of Buenavista lying south and east of a straight line passing through the center of the Panama Railroad Company's bridge No. 38 over the Agujeta River, and intersecting the boundaries of the Canal Zone with an inclination of forty degrees east of the magnetic meridian. The district of Cristobal shall be composed of the present municipal district of Cristobal and that portion of the municipal district of Buenavista lying north and west of a straight line passing through the center of the Panama Railroad Company's bridge No. 38 over the Agujeta River, and intersecting the boundaries of the Canal Zone with an inclination of forty degrees east of the magnetic meridian.

2. In each district there shall be appointed a tax collector, who shall discharge the duties of the present municipal treasurer and Board of Assessors. He shall be charged with the collection of license taxes, the assessment and collection of all ad valorem taxes, the preparation of head lists for work upon public improvements and the issuance of citations and collection of commutation taxes thereunder, the keeping of the Civil Register, the collection of rents from public and municipal property, the execution of leases thereof under direction of the Collector of Revenues, and in the proper case with the approval of the chief executive of the Canal Zone, the execution of deeds therefor. He shall also represent the municipality in all necessary litigation affecting municipal property within his district and shall from time to time discharge such other duties of a public nature as may be assigned to him by the duly authorized authorities of the Canal Zone. He shall keep books or rolls showing all assessments made, taxes and rents due, and collections made, and shall give such bond as may be required of him. He shall report to the Collector of Revenues and deposit all funds as he may be required with the Treasurer of the Canal Zone.

3. The existing regulations concerning the assessment and collection of taxes and the enforcement of tax liens shall be followed and applied by the Tax Collector so far as the same are not inconsistent with the terms of this order. Unpaid taxes of every character shall constitute a personal claim against the person against whom they are levied, and taxes upon real property shall, in addition, until paid, constitute a lien upon the realty. With respect to ad valorem taxes or other taxes levied by assessment, an appeal shall be allowed to the Circuit Judge for the district following a procedure to be prescribed by the Circuit Judges, by the owner or occupant in all cases where the assessment may be thought to be unduly high, and by the Collector of Revenues in all cases where it may be thought to be unduly low, when compared with assessments made upon similar property similarly situated elsewhere in the Zone. For the purpose of equalizing assessments in the several districts the three circuit judges shall once a year sit as a Board of Equalization.

4. There shall be appointed in each district a District Judge, who shall exercise all the authority now exercised by the Municipal Judges, and shall discharge such other duties as may from time to time be imposed upon him by law or executive order. There shall also be appointed for the whole Zone a fifth District Judge, to be known as the Senior District Judge, who shall sit wherever required of him and who shall once a month preside at and keep minutes of a conference of all the District Judges at which matters of common interest pertaining to their office shall be discussed. Any District Judge may temporarily be assigned to sit in any other district. Fines and fees shall be accounted for to the Collector of Revenues and paid in to the Treasurer of the Canal Zone.

5. Public works and improvements in the several districts shall be under the charge and direction of a Superintendent of Public Works appointed for the whole Zone, who shall also have charge and direction of slaughter house and market inspectors and shall discharge such other duties of a public character relative to the various districts as may be assigned to him.

6. Accounts shall be kept by the Collector of Revenues with each district and public improvements shall be distributed among the several districts with due regard to the revenue derived from each district. Rents derived from municipal property shall in all cases be expended upon public improvements or schools within the district from which it is collected.

7. Ordinances regulating police, sanitation and taxation, and any other matters now regulated by ordinance, may be enacted, and existing ordinances may be repealed, by the Isthmian Canal Commission, with the approval of the Secretary of War. They may be made operative throughout the Zone or confined to any particular district.

8. The municipal councils and all other municipal offices now existing under the laws of the Canal Zone are abolished.

9. The district officers herein provided for shall be appointed and their salaries fixed by the chief executive of the Canal Zone, subject to approval by the Commission.

10. The rules and regulations of the Isthmian Canal Commission compiled under the title of "Laws of the Canal Zone" in so far as they are inconsistent with this order, are modified and repealed.

Effective April 15th, 1907.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 13, 1907.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law it is ordered:

Section 179 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 179. An assault is punishable by fine not exceeding twenty-five dollars, or by imprisonment in jail not exceeding thirty days."

Section 181 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 181. A battery is punishable by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in jail not exceeding thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Section 209 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 209. Every parent of any child or husband of any wife lawfully chargeable with the support or maintenance of any child or wife who abandons or willfully omits, without lawfully excuse, to furnish food, shelter or medical attendance to such child or wife is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Section 342 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 342. Grand larceny is larceny committed in either of the cases:

"1. When the property taken is of the value of ten dollars and upwards.

"2. When the property is taken from the person of another.

"3. When the property taken is a horse, mare, gelding, cow, steer, bull, calf, mule, jack or jenny.

"4. When the property taken is the property of the United States, Isthmian Canal Commission or Government of the Canal Zone."

Section 368 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 368. Every person guilty of embezzlement is punishable in the manner prescribed for feloniously stealing property of the value of that embezzled; and where the property embezzled is an evidence of debt, or right of action, the sum due upon it or evidenced to be paid by it shall be taken as its value: Provided, That if the embezzlement or defalcation be of the property or public funds of the United States, Isthmian Canal Commission, or of the Government of the Canal Zone or of any municipality, city or village of the Canal Zone, the offense is a felony, and shall be punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not more than ten years; and the person so convicted shall be ineligible thereafter to any office or employment of honor, trust or profit with the United States, Isthmian Canal Commission, or Government of the Canal Zone."

Section 16 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 16. District judges shall have original jurisdiction in all cases of misdemeanor wherein the fines that may be imposed may not exceed one hundred dollars or imprisonment in jail may not exceed thirty days, or both. They shall have jurisdiction of the Circuit Court in cases of violation of Zone or District ordinances."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 13, 1907.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law it is ordered:

1. All marriages heretofore celebrated in the Canal Zone, by a minister of any religious society or denomination authorized by the forms and usages of his society or denomination to perform marriages, or by any judicial officer of the Canal Zone, shall be valid, anything contained in the laws of the Republic of Panama heretofore extended to the Canal Zone to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. Any judicial officer of the Canal Zone or minister of any religious society or denomination in good standing shall be authorized to celebrate marriages within the Canal Zone; provided that the contracting parties shall first have procured a marriage license of the circuit clerk of the circuit in which the marriage is to be performed. But no such license shall be issued unless the clerk is satisfied from the oaths of the parties and by other available evidence that the man to be married is not less than seventeen and the woman not less than fourteen years of age, and that no legal impediment to the marriage is known to exist.

3. The judicial officer or minister performing the marriage ceremony shall certify that fact upon and return the marriage license to the circuit clerk issuing the same, for registration. The circuit clerk shall be entitled to collect a fee of two dollars, gold, for issuing and recording the return of each marriage certificate.

4. Any judicial officer or minister within the Canal Zone violating the provisions of this order shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Effective June 1, 1907.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law it is ordered:

1. Offices for the convenient execution of its business within the United States shall be maintained by the Isthmian Canal Commission in Washington.

2. The following officers and employees of the Commission and their necessary force of assistants shall be provided with quarters therein: the General Counsel, General Purchasing Officer, Disbursing Officer in the United States, Assistant Examiner of Accounts, Appointment Clerk, Chief of Record Division, and Chief Draftsman.

3. The General Purchasing Officer shall provide the necessary offices and their appointments, and shall have general charge and custody of the same and of the discipline of the clerical force. Appointments in the United States of Commission employees shall be made by him, subject to the rules of the civil service law and of the Commission. He shall have charge of the records and archives of the offices, and of the distribution of correspondence.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 15, 1907.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law it is ordered:

1. That on and after August 15, 1907, the positions of General Auditor and Local Auditor be abolished.

2. That there be appointed for the Commission upon the Isthmus an Examiner of Accounts, and in Washington, D. C., an Assistant Examiner of Accounts.

3. The duties of the Examiner of Accounts on the Isthmus shall be:

(a) To inspect and examine all vouchers prepared and paid by the Disbursing Officer on the Isthmus.

(b) To inspect from time to time the accounts of all officials of the Commission on the Isthmus charged with the care of the funds or property of the Commission, and to annually verify property accounts by an inventory of all property.

(c) To semi-annually, or oftener if public interests seem to require, count the cash in the hands of disbursing officers and other officials on the Isthmus intrusted with the custody of funds of the Commission or of the Canal Zone Government.

(d) To check up from time to time as the interests of the Commission seem to require, through inspectors to be appointed by him, the returns of laborers and employees working by the day or upon an hourly basis in any of the several departments or divisions of the Commission. Inspectors now charged with similar duties under the Disbursing Officer shall be transferred to the jurisdiction of the Examiner of Accounts.

(e) To check from the appointment records the pay rolls of employees engaged upon a monthly or yearly basis.

(f) To examine periodically the general books of the Commission kept by the Disbursing Officer.

(g) To keep a record of claims payable to and of accounts and bills receivable by the Commission, and to check against the same collections made by the Disbursing Officers. It shall also be his duty to direct the attention of the Disbursing Officers from time to time to unsettled claims, accounts, or bills receivable by the Commission, and to urge their collection. Statements of all claims due the Commission or bills and accounts receivable shall be promptly transmitted by the department whence they originate to the Examiner of Accounts, in order that he may have an independent record of the claims, accounts and bills receivable with the collection of which the Disbursing Officer is charged. The original evidence or documents supporting such claims, accounts, or bills receivable shall be transmitted to the Disbursing Officer for collection.

(h) All vouchers for accounts payable or receivable shall be examined and checked by him as soon after payment as practicable. He shall, also, at a later period and as promptly as possible after transmission to him of the Disbursing Officer's account current, certify thereon his administrative examination of and transmit the same, together with accompanying vouchers, to the Auditor for the War Department, for final audit. He shall not, however, keep duplicate sets of vouchers or of the documentary or other evidence from which the vouchers are prepared, but may keep a voucher register.

(i) If he dissents from any voucher paid by the Disbursing Officer, he shall note his exceptions and submit the same to the Disbursing Officer for correction, before the latter's account current is made up. If an agreement shall not be arrived at between the Examiner of Accounts and the Disbursing Officer, a statement of the unadjusted differences shall be transmitted by the Examiner to the Auditor for the War Department, with the Disbursing Officer's account current.

(j) He shall also audit the accounts of the Canal Zone Government.

(k) He shall be appointed by and report to the Chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and it shall be his duty to call the attention of the Chairman to any irregularities in the accounts or books of any officer or employee of the Commission.

4. The duties of the Disbursing Officer on the Isthmus, in addition to the payment and disbursement of the funds of the Commission upon properly prepared vouchers, shall be:

(a) To assemble the original documents, papers, and other evidence from which the vouchers are prepared.

(b) To collect all claims due the Commission or accounts and bills receivable.

(c) To keep property accounts with the various officers upon the Isthmus charged with the cutsody or use of property.

(d) To keep the general books of the Commission, which shall properly classify all expenditures made by the Commission and apportion expenditures and the cost of labor and supplies among the several departments in the proportion in which they are used by the several departments.

(e) To furnish access at all times to his books, original papers, and documents, to the Examiner of Accounts and his representatives.

(f) To distribute expenditures made by the Commission under the proper appropriation heads.

(g) His books shall show the amount expended by each of the several departments during each calendar month and from the beginning of the work, and exhibit comparative statements of expenditures for the same calendar month of the previous year.

(h) His books shall likewise contain an exhibit of the work done by each department of the Commission, and by the Commission as a whole, and shall show the comparative cost of doing similar work between corresponding annual dates and between the several departments.

(i) In the total cost of the work, as performed by the several departments and by the Commission as a whole, account shall be taken of the general expenditures of the Commission, whether on the Isthmus or in the United States.

(j) He shall transmit weekly abstracts of the general books to the Disbursing Officer at Washington, in order that duplicates of the same may be kept in the United States.

(k) Requisitions for public funds shall be submitted to the Examiners of Accounts, for notation.

5. The Assistant Examiner of Accounts, so far as the requirements of the work in the United States demand or permit, shall perform for the Commission in the United States similar duties to those performed by the Examiner of Accounts on the Isthmus, and shall likewise inspect the accounts of Special Disbursing Officers not employed on the Isthmus, which shall be forwarded to him at Washington for that purpose before transmission to the Auditor for the War Department. Abstracts of approved expenditures by the Special Disbursing Officers shall be periodically transmitted by him to the Disbursing Officer upon the Isthmus, for entry in the general books.

6. The Disbursing Officer in the United States, so far as the requirements of the work in the United States demand or permit, shall perform duties corresponding to those of the Disbursing Officer on the Isthmus, except that the general books kept by him shall only be duplicates of the general books kept by the Disbursing Officer on the Isthmus. He shall weekly transmit to the Disbursing Officer on the Isthmus abstracts of all payments, disbursements, and collections made by him and statements of approved vouchers outstanding.

7. The original documents from which the vouchers are prepared shall be transmitted to the Auditor of the Treasury for the War Department by the several Disbursing Officers, with their accounts current, through the Examining Officers. Duplicates of such documents, however, shall be retained in the offices of the several Disbursing Officers, as part of the records of the Commission.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 15, 1907.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law, it is ordered:

That Title XIV of Act No. 14 of the Penal Code of the Laws of the Canal Zone be amended, effective January 15, 1908, by adding thereto the following section:

SECTION 293–A.

SUB-SECTION 1. Every vagrant or person found within the Canal Zone without legitimate business or visible means of support; and

SUB-SECTION 2. Every mendicant or habitual beggar found within the Canal Zone; and

SUB-SECTION 3. Every person found within or loitering about any laborers' camp, mess house, quarters, or other Isthmian Canal Commission building, or any railroad car, or station, or other building of the Panama Rail Road Company, or any dwelling or other building owned by any private person, without due and proper authority and permission so to be; or peddling goods or merchandise about any laborers' camp or mess house during hours when laborers are ordinarily employed at work, or in or about places where groups of men are at work; and

SUB-SECTION 4. Every person found in the Canal Zone in an intoxicated condition or under the influence of liquor; and SUB-SECTION 5. Every person who shall, in the Canal Zone, engage in any kind of disorderly conduct or breach or disturbance of the peace; shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $25, or by imprisonment in jail not to exceed 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1908.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law, it is ordered:

1. In all criminal prosecutions in the Canal Zone wherein the penalty of death or imprisonment for life may be inflicted, the accused shall enjoy the right of trial by an impartial jury of the district in which the crime shall have been committed, to be chosen as follows:

2. The clerk of the circuit court, the district judge, and the collector of revenue for the administrative district within the circuit in which the crime shall have been committed, shall constitute a jury commission for that circuit. In the second judicial district, the district judge and the collector of revenue to be members of the jury commission shall be designated by the circuit judge, upon this order becoming effective, and annually thereafter, or as often as a vacancy may occur in the jury commission.

3. Prior to the first day of the term of any circuit court, upon application of the prosecuting attorney, or by direction of the judge of the circuit in which the crime shall have been committed, the jury commission shall assemble and select the names of sixty male residents of the Canal Zone, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years, in good standing and in full possession of their ordinary faculties, who shall have resided within the Canal Zone for not less than three months previously, and who shall be able to read, write, and understand the English language. Attorneys at law, physicians, ministers of an established religion, members of the military, naval, and police forces, and officers of the Commission of the rank and above the rank of resident engineers, shall be exempt from jury service. The names of the persons so selected shall be written by one of the commissioners upon slips of paper, folded so as to conceal the names, in a uniform manner, and placed in a jury box.

4. Upon the first day of the term, unless an adjournment of the trial beyond the term shall be granted, the judge shall select from the jury box the names of thirty jurors to constitute the panel for the trial of the defendant. The said jurors shall thereupon be summoned by a written notice, served upon them by the marshal of the court, to attend at the trial of the defendant upon a day named. If it appear that any of the jurors whose names have been selected are absent from the Canal Zone, or incapacitated from other cause from attending as jurors, the judge, upon the application of the marshal, shall draw the names of other jurors and direct their summons until a panel of thirty jurors shall be assembled.

5. Upon calling the case for trial, twelve jurors shall be called to try the defendant in the order in which their names shall have been first drawn for summons by the circuit judge. Either side shall have the right to challenge any juror for cause, and, in addition thereto, the defendant and prosecuting attorney shall each have the right to challenge arbitrarily six of the said jurors. If the original panel of thirty shall be exhausted without securing twelve impartial jurors to try the defendant, the names of other jurors shall be drawn by the circuit judge from the jury box and such jurors summoned until the jury shall have been completed.

6. The jury so selected shall, under the instructions of the court, and in conformity with the procedure prevailing in the Federal courts of the United States, determine whether, under the facts as proved, the defendant is guilty or not guilty. They shall conduct their deliberations in secret, and shall return a verdict of guilty or not guilty, which must be unanimous. Sentence shall be pronounced by the court.

7. The circuit judge shall have the discretion to require the jury to be together and apart from the public from the time they are sworn until their verdict shall be returned. If they be kept together, suitable provision shall be made by the marshal of the court for their subsistence and lodging. The jurors shall be allowed a fee of two dollars for each day actually summoned to court and engaged in the trial of a criminal action. The cost of subsistence and lodging of the jurors and the fees for the jurors' attendance shall be paid from the Treasury of the Canal Zone, upon a voucher duly approved by the circuit judge.

8. It shall in all cases be optional with defendants to be tried before a jury as provided for in this order, or under the procedure prescribed in Section 171 (Act 15) of the Laws of the Canal Zone. The accused shall, however, in person or through his attorney, file a written statement with the clerk of the circuit court before which his trial is to take place, on the first day of the term for which the trial is set, stating the procedure by which he desires to be tried. The procedure having been once selected by the accused cannot thereafter be changed, but must be followed with respect to any future trial of the accused for the same offense.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 6, 1908.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I would ask my colleague to yield me about three minutes more. I do not want to detain the House longer than that.

Mr. RYAN. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I failed to make myself clear to the gentleman from Illinois. So I take the liberty of reiterating the gist of what I said before. In answer to him, and in answer to the brief of the Attorney-General, which is being filed as a part of his remarks by the gentleman from Illinois, I maintain that they have not disposed of the real question here involved. The substance of what the Attorney-General says is: That the power to govern conferred upon the President by the Fifty-eighth Congress, when we took possession of and occupied the Canal Zone, which is the power given him in the first section of that act, implied authority to govern in so far as government was needful to secure the "safety and welfare of the inhabitants." I have said several times in the course of my remarks that the President was obliged to maintain a de facto government down there or anarchy would have resulted, but beyond securing the safety and welfare of the inhabitants there he had no right to go.

He had no more right to do anything beyond the power given to him still earlier in the Spooner Act of 1902, namely, to secure the police and sanitary welfare of the Zone. But he has, in these Executive orders I have read, exceeded his authority in establishing substantial laws and abolishing laws of the Isthmian Canal Commission enacted by authority of Congress. Now, the Attorney-General seems to think that the solemn act of the House of Representatives limiting the President's power to govern to the life of that Congress was merely a "declaration" of a right already existing in the President. This seems to me utterly untenable. We have not yet reached that period of self-abasement. The right of legislation is by the Constitution vested in the Congress, not in the Executive. When we delegate to him that power for a limited space of time it is to be strictly construed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RYAN. I have nothing to add to what has already been said.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to ask the gentleman to allow me to have some time.

Mr. RYAN. What time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. RYAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I had intended saying something on this resolution at the proper time, but the gentleman from Illinois, it seems to me, has practically covered the ground. However, this matter is an entirely practical business proposition, but I am convinced that this discussion would have been more harmonious, more in keeping with proper procedure for the House in obtaining information, if the discussion had arisen at the time the information asked for was furnished by the President. But one thing has been established clearly, it seems, by the gentleman from New York; that is, we are on the Isthmus, and it is admitted we are there for the purpose of constructing the canal, and the gentleman admits here—I believe I am stating nothing that he will deny, when I say that he admits that there must be order on the Zone and that the President has proceeded wisely in the exercise of the power to accomplish that end.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not suppose the gentleman heard my remarks or else I have failed lamentably to make myself clear, for I do not admit what he has just said and never have.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentleman does not revise his remarks in the RECORD, I think it will appear that he has stated that the President has acted as wisely as the House could have done if the Congress itself had determined that matter.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the gentleman will recollect that I said some of those laws were very wise laws, and I commend very highly the one establishing jury trial, and put that in my own bill for the government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I gave the gentleman credit for stating a fact. I supposed that would be conceded by all the Members of this House. Now the gentleman seeks to arraign the President because he has not compelled the House and the Congress to act in this matter. That was the conclusion, or one of the conclusions, which he reached in this discussion. And yet gentlemen are arising on that side of the House frequently, complaining of the influence which the President exercises over this body. For myself, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me if there is anything to be done, if the gentleman from New York and other gentlemen are complaining that the exercise of authority on the Isthmus has not been in accordance with the wishes of the people of the United States, it does not lie in our mouths now to complain, because we have done nothing in the premises. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HARRISON. Is not the gentleman a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has jurisdiction?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has had this matter before, and on its own motion, practically. It realized that here was a question which was new, so far as the legislative policies of this Government were concerned. It recognized the fact that there were matters in the process of evolution there, that conditions were being worked out, upon which the legislature could not at present intelligently act. I trust I am not asking undue credit for our committee when I say that it tries to act intelligently upon all questions which are brought before it. We have studied this subject carefully, and we believed it was in the interest of this country and in the interest of the canal that these problems should be worked out in the best way possible, and we have not reached that point yet when I, the humblest of the members of the committee, can suggest to this House any policy which I would recommend that it should adopt. Therefore I say it seems to me, inasmuch as the burden of the argument of the gentleman at least admits that the power has been exercised wisely, it does not lie with us to criticise at this time our own act, perhaps, or failure to act in the premises.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, inasmuch as he is upon the committee which has had consideration of this question. The right of sovereignty involves the right to govern men and things. Now, sovereignty in this country is threefold; that is, our governing power expresses itself through three branches—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. What authority is conferred upon the Executive to exercise legislative power?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not believe that the Constitution confers any direct legislative power, or, rather, the right to delegate direct legislative power. It seems to me that all the decisions have practically established this. In the case of the Isthmian Zone a new problem is presented, and no precedent is found. This Government does not own the strip, nor is it an ordinary lessee. It is in possession for a special purpose. In a sense it is foreign territory; in another sense it is subject to the United States Government. A canal is to be constructed.

The Zone must be governed in an orderly manner. Congress charged the President with full responsibility of the enterprise. It dissolved the Commission. It passed no law for the government of the strip. The power conferred upon the President from the nature of things must be a continuing one until Congress relieves him. He has promulgated rules or regulations necessary, as his critics must admit, for the prosecution of the great work in hand.

Gentlemen may call this legislation if they will, but I call it regulation for the temporary management of an evolutionary enterprise in a district or territory whose status has not yet been fixed by law. If the President had done otherwise than he has done, the very gentlemen who criticise him now would condemn him for failure to perform a clear and lawful duty to the country.

Mr. RYAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the admission from one of the most fair-minded men on that side of the House this morning, to the effect that the President of the United States even in the Canal Zone, or anywhere else when exercising his authority, is subject to the Constitution of the United States—the instrument which gives him the only authority that he has or any other President of these United States ever had. That is all that has ever been contended for by me or by others. The President being a creature of the Constitution, can not be "applied" anywhere except where the Constitution "applies" him. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are not complaining here, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] a moment ago said, "because the President did not compel the Congress to legislate;" we are complaining, on the contrary, because Congress not having legislated, the President of the United States usurped the power to legislate. Being a creature of the Constitution, he is not only not given by the Constitution any legislative power, but he is absolutely forbidden to exercise any, and Congress itself is forbidden to confer upon him any, by that part of the Constitution which makes the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of this Government separate, coordinate, and independent.

My friend from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has made the argument of the poet—

> For forms of government let fools contest;
> That form is best which is administered best.

He has made the argument of the mob engaged in a lynching bee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], contrary to his previous legislative history, has also made the argument of a mob engaged in a lynching bee. His only argument has been that the necessary legislative power of the Government not having been sufficiently exercised by the legislative branch there arose a "necessity" that the President should exercise it, Constitution or no Constitution, power or no power, right or no right, authority or no authority. The man who is engaged in a lynching bee simply says, "This man is guilty, he deserves death, and the law does not mete it out to him, and therefore I will."

This is a government of law and not a government of persons. This is a government of prescribed regulation and not a government of contingencies or of real or fancied necessities. It carefully avoids "necessity, the tyrant's plea." It says "Within certain bounds ye shall walk, and outside shall ye not tread at all." The people say that to the Government in the fundamental law—their prescribing voice.

My friend from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] says that he would not call these legislative acts promulgated by the President legislation at all; he would call them "rules"—upon the general principle, I reckon, of a violation of Shakespeare's maxim, which would run that a rose by some other name smells sweeter than a rose by its own name. [Laughter and applause.] Everybody knows what legislation is. Everybody knows what execution of legislation is. Everybody knows what the construction of legislation is. Everybody, therefore, understands the nature of and the difference between the legislative, Executive, and judicial powers, and everybody knows that nowhere under our form of government is the Executive permitted to become the legislative power of the United States. The people themselves in adopting the fundamental law prescribed and uttered in tones of thunder to all creatures of the Government, from the President down to the lowest tidewaiter, "Your duties are confined to those of an executive; you have no legislative power, and we will not permit even Congress to confer any upon you."

This Republican party has made a shameful failure, and now it attempts to excuse itself on the ground that Congress, having made a failure, to wit, a failure to legislate, the President must be excused for having committed a crime, to wit, a usurpation; to wit again, a usurpation of legislative power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has already been said. This is a unanimous report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I believe the House should know by what authority the President is exercising the functions of government in the Canal Zone, and I trust this resolution will pass. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4112) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906, and move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a Senate bill with House amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. COUSINS, Mr. LANDIS, and Mr. HOWARD.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the pension appropriation bill, and pending that motion, I would state that it has been understood that general debate will close with a few remarks on the bill by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS] and further remarks by myself, not occupying in the aggregate more than one hour and a half, and I ask unanimous consent that with those provisions, debate be closed in that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all general debate upon the pension appropriation bill close at the conclusion of remarks by himself and by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS], not to exceed one hour and a half in the aggregate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, with Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and desire to have read a concurrent resolution of the general assembly of Virginia, adopted on February 14, 1908.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to oppose in every possible manner the influx into Virginia of immigrants from southern Europe.

Resolved by the senate of Virginia (the house of delegates concurring), That our Representatives in both Houses of Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to oppose in every possible manner the influx into Virginia of immigrants from southern Europe, with their Mafia and Black-Hand and murder societies, and with no characteristics to make them, with us, a homogenous people, believing, as we do, that upon Anglo-Saxon supremacy depend the future welfare and prosperity of this Commonwealth, and we view with alarm any effort that may tend to corrupt its citizenship.

Agreed to by general assembly of Virginia February 14, 1908.

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,
Clerk House of Delegates and Keeper of the Records of Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I heartily approve of this resolution and desire to submit some remarks in support of it. I have always believed it was wise to encourage immigration, if the immigrants were of the proper class. Virginia and the entire South needs immigration; her mineral resources can not be developed with the labor now available; her manufacturing interest needs an influx of labor; her agricultural interest is crying out for more labor. But while this is true, I am thoroughly satisfied that she had better suffer for a lack of the necessary number of laborers than introduce into her midst the class of immigration against which this resolution is directed.

The question is often raised as to whether the founders and fashioners of our scheme of government would be equal to the problems which confront us to-day.

Whatever decision the question might receive as a merely academic one—for one problem they attempted no solution, for they did not anticipate its emergency in pressing and practical shape—I mean the conversion of our territory into the dumping ground of the nations. They could have no prevision of the great steam-propelling caravansaries of the sea; of the great trunk lines across the continent; of the abolition of space by the telegraph. Their forecast was of a steady and normal access and increase of population. And, indeed, the immigration to our shores during the entire first century of our life as a nation was salutary and encouraging and was of our own stock. Practically all the immigrants who came to this country before 1880 were from northern Europe. They were of Celtic and Teutonic origin; or, I might say, they were of the strong historic peoples, the authors of the civilization of northern Europe—of the land of Shakespeare and Gladstone, of Emmet and Burke, of Goethe and Bismarck.

Would that we had gone on at this wholesome pace; that we had not gone into the recesses of "all sorts and conditions of men" to meet the immediate clamor of a hustling, a restless, and a feverish age.

The rock upon which one nation splits stands in the mid course of every ship of state. The ruthlessness and the recklessness of riches have ever piloted the ship upon the reef, the shoal, or the rock. The lessons of history have a mournful monotony. The Roman Republic, the nearest akin to ours, had a most auspicious outlook; and for five hundred years, in steady and homogeneous development, she was the light of the world; but in a single century she destroyed the very genius of her civic life and institutions. First, she conquered Carthage; then one by one all the ring belt of the Mediterranean; and then imported hordes of alien peoples within her own confines.

No American can read the story of the decadence and downfall of Rome without anxiety and solicitude for their own mighty Republic.

What graver problem can confront us as a people, looking to future results and reasoning upon the analogies of the experiences of other peoples, than the perpetual influx of hordes of heterogenous foreigners in to our already congested cities?

The year 1906 was the banner year for immigration into America, there having arrived here for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, 1,100,735 of all classes. The largest numbers came from countries as follows:

Austria-Hungary	265,138
German Empire	37,564
Italy	273,120
Russian Empire	215,655
England	49,491
Ireland	34,995
Japan	13,835
West Indies	13,653

The distribution of these immigrants as to numerical preponderance was in the following order: New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Ohio. It is a fact that two-thirds of the immigrants to this country settle in the Atlantic or Middle Western States, already thickly populated, and the proportion of foreign-born to native population in many of the cities of that section has already become startling.

Hear these figures: In Fall River, Mass, the native-born population constitutes only 14 per cent of the entire population, while 86 per cent of it is foreign born. In Milwaukee only 17 per cent is native born and 83 per cent of it is foreign born. In New York, Chicago, Detroit, Paterson, and Cleveland only about 25 per cent of the population is native born, while three-fourths is foreign born.

Speaking generally, we have thirty-eight cities of over 100,000 population. Of these only eleven have a native element of over 50 per cent.

And the foreign elements are not assimilative necessarily. Take our two most cosmopolitan and progressive cities, New York and Chicago, and both contain colonies of Italians, Poles, Finns, and Hungarians. These people follow only the natural and inevitable law of kindred and congenial peoples, flocking together and assimilating.

When a plethora of people shall dominate a land so diverse in climate and interest as is our land, the real question is, What shall the harvest be? Our gravest, most judicial, and best minds are already pondering the problem with seriousness and solicitude.

The question then may be not what is the Constitution amongst friends; may it not rather be, What are the Constitution and Union amongst such diverse, separated, and potential interests?

I am glad the South is a homogeneous people. I believe the day will come when it will prove to this great Republic a shelter in the time of storm.

North and South Carolina have almost no foreign element. Georgia almost none; Mississippi but little; Virginia, Arkansas, and Tennessee no significant admixture. On the other hand, North Dakota is 75 per cent foreign; Minnesota is a close second, while more than half the population of Wisconsin, South Dakota, Utah, Montana, Michigan, Illinois, California, New York, New Jersey, and Rhode Island is foreign, counting in each case the native born of foreign parentage.

The South desires immigration, and home seekers from the Northwest principally are coming in to help build up the waste places, and to identify themselves with the country. This is desirable, normal, and healthful.

We are anxious for and welcome such immigration as this. We also welcome to our midst immigration from northern Europe of those people who are of our blood. We need and desire immigration to build up and add to the prosperity of the Southern States, but we want it to come in orderly procession and not pellmell. We want people who will build their homes upon our hills, who will mix their blood with our blood, and who, honoring our Constitution and reverencing our God, will preserve untarnished the straight and simple beliefs in which we have been reared.

Patriotism in any real and natural sense is centrifugal. It begins with the home as the center, and its widening spread is concentric. Home, neighborhood, county, State, nation; whatever tends to subvert this order is illogical and unnatural. It is the fancy of the doctrinaire and the dreamer, and involves a menace rather than a blessing.

Is a large aggregation of indefinite people merely, as such, a theme to incite enthusiasm and create a patriotic glow? The access of patriotic interests and pride proceeds in arithmetic, not geometric, ratio. "We, the people," should be an assimilative people, always tending to homogeneity. And this can not be produced by leaps and bounds.

Is it not of the very essence and wisdom of statesmanship to conserve something for ourselves and our children? To make some provision for natural increase and expansion?

Let this heterogeneous influx continue for twenty-five years, and we may repeat the experience of Rome.

We are growing and developing too rapidly for the permanent good of our country. Hotbeds are for exotics. The steady recurrence of the seasons is nature's sure law for normal development. Our ambassador to England congratulated the United States on Thanksgiving Day of the past year, with the prediction that before another Presidential term is ended we shall have 100,000,000 population. A more important question than that of numbers is, Who will these added millions be?

We are too prone to vaunt our prowess. Doubtless the greater number of people we have to work, the more money will flow into the pockets of the favored few, and the more luxurious and sensuous will be our life. But the important question for us to consider is, What will be the effect of these numbers upon the great body of the American people?

By the history we have made we are the "foremost nation in the files of time," but materialism and commercialism will not maintain our place. The voices of the past which have made this Capitol vocal with lofty and inspiring memories admonish us to the contrary. The faith of our fathers was a living faith. I do not think we shall attain to a higher.

A great scholar and thinker has characterized the mission of the three great ancient, historic peoples—the Hebrews, to teach man his relations to his Maker; the Greeks, to teach man to analyze and to understand himself; the Romans, to teach him his relationship to the state. And we are the heirs of all these.

I would prefer to see our country go along more gradually, unfolding the lessons of self-government, demonstrating that we know how to conserve and to perpetuate this legacy, so fostering and stimulating by our own course the vitality of the blessed doctrine of "peace on earth, good will among men" that other nations will be constrained to emulate us. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, the measure under consideration is the largest pension appropriation bill that has been reported to this body since the year 1894, the increase being due, of course, to the operation of the McCumber Act, passed February 6, 1907, which not only gave a pensionable status to all soldiers who had reached a given age, thus making age a disability within the meaning of the invalid-pension law, but also increased the amount of pension with the increase in age, thus adding greatly to the annual value of the pension roll.

It is not due to any increase in the number of pensioners, for they have steadily declined in number during the last several years, the decrease for the last three years being 36,825, owing, of course, to deaths.

All this is demonstrated by the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions to the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. KEIFER, from which I read:

> The total number of certificates issued under the McCumber Act prior to January 1, 1908, is 281,475, which increased the annual value of the pension roll $15,018,300.

The amount which any bill carries for the payment of pensioners is a matter of mathematical calculation. The Department knows from its rolls the number of claimants and the amount of each, as well as the probable additions or decreases during the year. All that is needed, therefore, is to cast up the account and the result is arrived at. It is already fixed by law, and nothing is to be gained or elucidated by discussing it; but there is one phase of this bill which presents an opportunity to accomplish a practical economy and saving of more than $200,000 per annum (the amount saved being increased each year) in the administration of the Pension Bureau that ought to be adopted, and to which I desire briefly to address myself.

I refer of course, Mr. Chairman, to that feature of the bill which consolidates all the pension agencies, now scattered all over the country, into one central agency by omitting the appropriations for all of such agencies save one, and I desire for a moment to go into the history of the movement which culminated in this provision. Gentlemen will no doubt recall that the bill reported at the last session of Congress reduced the number of pension agencies from eighteen to nine. When the matter was considered in the House this body not only indorsed that proposition, but went further and struck out the appropriation for all of the agencies except one, and the bill in that shape went to the Senate, which restored the agencies that were dropped. In conference the Senate provision prevailed and the agencies were permitted to stand, but there was added to the bill this proviso or rider:

> Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make inquiry and report to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session the effect of a reduction of the present pension agencies to one such agency upon the economical execution of the pension law, the prompt and efficient payment of pensioners, and the inconvenience to pensioners, if any, which would result from such reduction. This provision shall not be construed as interfering with or limiting the right or power of the President under the existing law in respect to reduction or consolidation of existing agencies.

Acting under that request from Congress, the Secretary of the Interior has addressed a letter to the chairman of the Appropriation Committee which leaves no doubt as to the position of the Interior Department on this question and presents the case in a way which, in my judgment, is absolutely unanswerable.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes, a question.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. What examination did the committee make in complying with the request of the House about making an inquiry?

Mr. BOWERS. Why, the committee had a very full hearing on the effect of this consolidation or unification, and came unanimously to the conclusion that the good of the service and the economical administration of the pension laws demanded it.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. A hearing of whom?

Mr. BOWERS. A hearing at which the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior and others from the Pension Office were present.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Who were your "others?" Will you please name them?

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Thompson, chief of the division of finance of the Pension Bureau——

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Have you named all who came before you?

Mr. BOWERS. All that I now recall.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Did you subpœna or ask the opinion of a single agent throughout the country?

Mr. BOWERS. We did not. We did not think it was necessary, and we did not expect to get entirely unbiased opinions from them. I am speaking for myself alone on this last point; I do not care to commit any other gentleman on the committee to it, but I preferred the opinion of people other than those whose offices were to be abolished.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Did you invite from them any opinion as to economy, promptness, or efficiency?

Mr. BOWERS. We did not; but we have received some opinions from them in the shape of letters, which I will proceed to discuss. And now, with all due deference, I must decline to yield further. I have answered the gentleman frankly and fully. I am trying to make a consecutive argument on this proposition, and I shall be glad to answer any questions any gentlemen may put on the subject, but I request them to withhold them until the conclusion of my remarks. I will have time to answer then, and I think when I have finished that probably the questions can be more intelligently put and answered, and that less time will be consumed in doing so.

The Secretary of the Interior, in his letter, says:

1. Economic execution of pension laws.—The annual expenditure on account of the payment of pensions, including the salaries of pension agents, clerk hire, contingent expenses, and the printing of vouchers and checks, is approximately $550,000, an average cost per pensioner of 55 cents per annum. It is estimated that after a consolidation has been completed and in perfect working order, all pensioners could be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions or one disbursing officer, located in the city of Washington, with an annual expenditure of, at most, $350,000, a saving of 20 cents per annum per pensioner, or $200,000. After the first year of the consolidation, I am of the opinion that the appropriation for the expense of paying pensions could be safely reduced at least $25,000 more.

And also says:

2. The prompt and efficient payment of pensioners.—If all pensioners are paid by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, provision should be made for a division of the pensioners into three groups, one group to be paid each month, as at present, and all pensioners could be paid as promptly by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, as by eighteen agents.

And right here at this point I want to say that the Interior Department and the Commissioner of Pensions have evidenced their faith in this proposition by asking that an appropriation for the payment of clerk hire and for the administration of this part of the Pension Bureau be reduced $100,000, and the actual saving which is brought about by this bill amounts to practically $200,000 for the first year alone. Further on in this same report the Commissioner says:

There are certain other conditions to which attention should be invited if all pensions should be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one central disbursing officer located in this city. The records would be readily accessible for reference by the Bureau. A large amount of extra correspondence is now required to furnish information to correspondents relative to the payment of pensions. The Bureau must first obtain such information from the pension agents, and a great deal of time is consumed in securing this information, especially from agencies located in distant cities.

All vouchers now required by pensioners are printed by the Government Printing Office in this city and forwarded to the different pension agents, there to be prepared and mailed to the pensioner with checks for the preceding quarter. All checks now used by the pension agents are likewise printed in this city. A considerable saving would result in the cost of printing vouchers and also in the cost of printing checks if such vouchers and checks were prepared for one agency rather than for eighteen.

All paid vouchers must be forwarded by the pension agents to the Auditor for the Interior Department in this city. There is always danger of the loss of such vouchers in the mails. Many vouchers of widow pensioners under the general law and under the act of June 27, 1890, were recently lost in transit from one of the pension agencies to the Auditor in this city. No trace of the missing vouchers has as yet been discovered. The pension agent has since died, and his accounts can not be settled for many months on account of the lost vouchers.

One of the objections that is urged to this plan, Mr. Chairman, is that it will delay the pensioners in the receipt of their quarterly payments. There is absolutely no foundation for that contention, beyond the fact that when the change is made the initial payment may be delayed a few days. But it will start a new ninety-day period, and every pensioner will receive his pension quarterly within ninety days after the receipt of his original payment; and there will practically be no delay even on this initial payment, except on the Pacific coast, where a delay of four or five days may be suffered in the payment of the first quarterly installment after the change has gone into operation, but there will be no delay thereafter. Now, the advantages which are to be gained are these:

First. A reduction in the appropriation for clerical force or clerk hire of over $100,000.

Second. The elimination of all unnecessary correspondence between the central Pension Office here and the various agencies throughout the country.

Third. A saving in printing and stationery, the amount of which not only will be reduced, but the printing can be uniformly done for use all over the United States, instead of having separate printing for each of the eighteen agencies.

Fourth. The elimination of an expensive system in the shape of duplication of records. In the existing system the record of every pension that is paid is kept here, and a similar record is kept in the pension agency from which the payment is made. This duplication of records will be eliminated by the consolidation of that is here proposed.

Fifth. The prevention of the loss of vouchers, and on this particular point both the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions called attention to the fact that a large number of vouchers sent en bloc by one of the pension agencies to the Department here was lost in transit, and that great confusion has resulted in the settlement of that pension agent's account, which had not been, up to the time of this hearing, and I do not think has been since, adjusted.

Sixth. Items of rent and inspection. These may be considered small items, but it will take at least $1,500 per year out of the bill for the inspection of agencies, for no inspection will be needed if it is all done here in the central Bureau, and $4,500 per annum for rent for the quarters which the pension agency occupies in the city of New York will also be eliminated.

Seventh. We will have the advantages of the Bureau being under one roof, in one building here, which the Commissioner of Pensions declares is sufficient to accommodate and house all of these agencies and their clerical force, as well as a complete supervision over them, with the prevention of the delays incident to correspondence, and the confusion, errors, and delay incident to the work and force being divided and located at widely distant points.

Eighth. The elimination of seventeen officers, pension agents, whose salaries are $4,000 a year each. The saving on this point alone is $68,000.

This consolidation will therefore save $100,000 for clerk hire, and that would have been further reduced but for the fact that the expense of making the change would necessarily create an expense greater at the outset than will be incurred in the future; and this appropriation for clerk hire will be still further reduced, if this goes into operation, by the next bill reported on the subject. Sixty-eight thousand dollars' decrease in the pension agents' salaries and $6,000 for rent and inspection make a total of something like $174,000; and but for the fact that I stated a moment ago, namely, that these changes will involve during the first year some extra expenditures, the appropriation for stationery and incidental expenses would have been decreased $10,000, and such a decrease will be carried by the next pension bill, always assuming that this plan goes into operation.

Now, I wish to ask, at the close of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, to insert certain extracts from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior on this subject, and from the testimony of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior in the hearings before the committee. I will not take time to allude to that now, but will append them at the end of my remarks. Now, let us consider for a moment some of the other objections that have been urged against the adoption of this plan, and just here I want to say that so far as this particular plan or scheme is concerned, it is safe from any point of order. It does not constitute legislation on an appropriation bill. It is simply a failure to appropriate for more than one agency. The objections to which I now come, I read from the letter of Gen. St. Clair A. Mulholland, United States pension agent at Philadelphia, to Senator PENROSE, a letter which I presume has been universally distributed among the Members of the House—I know I received this through my mail. His first complaint is that no specific statement is made as to where and how the reduction in expenses will be accomplished.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary and Commissioner of Pensions have set forth where the saving will be made. They have told you that this will pare off in the next year $100,000 from the appropriation for clerk hire, with an additional saving in the future, and have called attention to the other items mentioned by me. His objection is "that it would increase rather than diminish the amount of clerk hire," and he works that out by making a computation as to the comparative amounts paid here and elsewhere, showing that the average amount paid in the Pension Bureau—not the Washington pension agency—is more than the average amount paid the clerks in the offices of the pension agents. Manifestly there is no force in that proposition. The work in the pension agencies is largely, if not entirely, clerical. In the Pension Bureau it is very largely expert, requiring a large number of high-priced, expert men. If bringing these agencies in and bringing a part of the employees into the city of Washington is going to operate to increase the salaries of the clerks brought in, there might be something in his point. But the high-grade, expensive clerks are those who pass upon the issuance and the granting of pensions, and not the men who do the clerical work relating to the payment of vouchers; and the sum which will be paid to these clerks will be the same that they are now receiving in the various agencies where they are now at work.

May I ask how much time I have consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BOWERS. I might again repeat on this proposition that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions, on this decrease of clerical hire, have proven their faith by their works in that they have requested a reduction in these items. In addition to the matters of saving which I have mentioned, there will be a vast advantage gained by reason of the unification of methods and unification of administration, such as can come about only by gathering these various agencies together under one head.

At present there is a vast discrepancy not only in the method of administration—that is, in the office methods used, the way in which the clerical force is handled, and the method of doing things in each particular agency—but also in the cost of administration in these agencies, as measured by the number of pensioners paid from each. And in several the number of pensioners has fallen below the point at which the offices can be economically administered, and the abolition of such agencies is another point to be considered in arriving at a conclusion about this matter.

Again, with this unification of method, the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions will be enabled to introduce a large number of labor-saving devices, which economize greatly on the cost of administration and which can not be economically introduced except where there is a very large amount of work to be done, and can not be put into operation in these smaller pension agencies where now the cost of administration has mounted up above that which the Department and the committee think warranted by good practice and good government.

It is idle to contend, in my judgment, that this plan is going to result in the slightest injury to a single soldier or a single person now on the pension roll. We can say that with the lights before us, without treating it as an experiment.

As a matter of fact, the naval pensioners are paid from only a very few agencies. There are eighteen pension agencies in the United States, and of that number only five or six pay naval pensions. These send their vouchers out to the naval pensioners in the remote parts of this country. They are received back in due course of time, and there has never been the slightest complaint as to that method of administration.

If that be true, if it be true that this plan or a modification of this plan has caused no trouble with reference to the payment of naval pensioners, has brought no ill results, has caused no inconvenience, is it not equally true that if there be a consolidation of all of the pension agencies in the city of Washington, no harm can come to any of the pensioners of the United States, except the trifling inconvenience, too small to be considered, of the delay of a few days, in no event to exceed five or six even in the remotest parts of the Pacific slope, in the receipt of their first voucher after this goes into effect?

Just a word as to how it will be put into effect, and I am done. The pensioners are divided into groups, as every gentleman no doubt knows. There are four groups. In one group the payments are made March 4, June 4, September 4, and December 4. In another they are paid January 4, April 4, July 4, and October 4, and so on.

The proposition of the Pension Commissioner is, as soon as this act goes into effect, to call in the outside agencies, as follows, which I quote from his testimony:

> In the case of the agencies which make payment on the 4th day of next April, we would wait until after that April payment had been made by the agencies, and then we would immediately call them in, bringing here their books, their clerks, and all that would be necessary to bring, so as to have them here in time to issue for the next payment in July from this Office. For those agencies that pay in May, we would wait until the May payment had been made, and then we would call them in, so that they would be ready to make their next payment from here. That would enable us to effect the consolidation without any delay or inconvenience. We could simply keep the matter going, keep step, without any trouble. It would be necessary to bring some clerks from each agency, possibly all of them to start with, until we could get matters adjusted. The appropriation to start with could be reduced $100,000 on the item of clerk hire for the first year anyway, and it would be more than that after we got the thing adjusted and running in good shape.

And you will specially note that he says all this can be done without the slightest friction and without the slightest delay in the payment of pensioners, except that resulting from the increased time which it takes to carry a letter from the city of Washington to the Pacific coast or to other points which are nearer to pension agencies as they are now established than to Washington.

So, Mr. Chairman, I say that good administration and economy both imperatively demand the adoption of this plan, which results in a saving of about $200,000 immediately, and which will result in an additional and larger annual saving in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWERS. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In the course of the gentleman's speech he stated the amount that it now costs us to pay the pensioners through the different agencies and he also stated the amount which he estimates it will cost under the plan which he proposes. Will the gentleman be willing to repeat those figures?

Mr. BOWERS. With a great deal of pleasure. I will read again from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LAWRENCE. So the supposition upon which the gentleman and his committee are acting is that there will be a saving to the Government of about $200,000 a year?

Mr. BOWERS. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It seems to me that that is a material reduction in expense and one which should be favored, providing there goes with it promptness and efficiency of administration. It would not, however, be commendable economy if such reduction results in inefficient service and in serious inconvenience to pensioners. If I understand the gentleman correctly, the investigation by the committee resulted in an assurance that there would be practical and efficient administration, as efficient as now exists under the different agents.

Mr. BOWERS. The statements of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions were positive and unequivocal on the proposition that there could be absolutely no inconvenience to anyone, and no delay save the initial delay in the transmission of the first letter containing the first voucher, immediately after this plan goes into effect. It would simply establish a new ninety-day cycle, and every pensioner would receive his voucher in ninety days from the date he received the former.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Am I correct in the statement that there are now eighteen pension agencies?

Mr. BOWERS. Eighteen.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Can the gentleman tell me the average number of clerks employed?

Mr. BOWERS. I have not that information.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Can the gentleman tell me how large a force it will be necessary to have at the Pension Office in Washington to carry on the work here.

Mr. BOWERS. I think the bringing of the agents to Washington will result in a material diminution of the force. There have been several estimates made, unofficial, I believe, on that point, and the prevailing impression seems to be that the force will be reduced about 50 per cent.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it expected that the Pension Department can do the work with the force it now maintains?

Mr. BOWERS. Oh, no. It is expected that they will bring in as many of the clerks who have been employed in the various agencies as may be needed for that purpose.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman referred to the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions, in whose judgment I may say I have great confidence. Was the Commissioner unqualifiedly of the opinion that there will be as efficient and prompt service under the administration from Washington as exists under the administration through the different agencies?

Mr. BOWERS. He could not have stated it more strongly. He says in his testimony before the committee:

> As far as I personally am concerned, it would be better for me if the agencies should remain just as they are, as their consolidation would make me additional responsibility and labor; but looking at it from a business point of view, and as if it were my own business, I would consolidate them instantly, or as soon as it could be done. It would be more economical for the Government; it would work better than to have these agencies scattered all over the country. The work would go smoother, mistakes could be corrected quickly, information obtained at once, and the records be kept in better shape.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I was somewhat impressed by the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] as to the people whom you interrogated before your committee. He asked if any pension agents were summoned before the committee.

Mr. BOWERS. None were summoned, none asked to come.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wanted to ask the gentleman if any pension agent asked to appear before the committee?

Mr. BOWERS. If they did I never heard of it.

Mr. TIRRELL. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield for a question?

Mr. BOWERS. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], I will yield. I am encroaching upon his time.

Mr. TIRRELL. I am in full sympathy with the proposition of the gentleman. I would like to have him state, if he can, if there is any special benefit to the pensioner in having these local agencies; does he derive any special benefit therefrom?

Mr. BOWERS. None whatever. On the contrary, the consolidation reduces the probability of mistakes. Certainly the pensioner will not be hurt by this measure, and I may say that since this discussion began I have heard Members say that they have received many complaints of delays, errors, and inconvenience resulting from the present system.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BOWERS. I will be very glad to answer any questions so long as I do not encroach too much on the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I would like to have the gentleman answer this objection that is made: That a great many vouchers executed by old soldiers are improperly executed, and by reason of that fact have to be returned, all of which would consume much time, and if the soldier resided a number of hundred miles from Washington it would delay the payment of his pension.

Mr. BOWERS. My understanding about that is that the number of vouchers in which any mistake is made in the execution by the claimant is so small as to be a negligible quantity, about one in a thousand, I am advised. After this, if a mistake is made, of course they will have to go back; but, as suggested a moment ago, that is so small a quantity as to cut no figure whatever in this equation.

Mr. DAVIDSON. That is what I wanted to find out—about how many were incorrectly made.

APPENDIX.

Hearings conducted by the subcommittee, Messrs. J. Warren Keifer, Washington Gardner, W. P. Brownlow, E. J. Bowers, and L. F. Livingston, of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, in charge of the pension appropriation bill for 1909—Statement of Hon. Vespasian Warner, Commissioner, accompanied by Mr. A. H. Thompson, chief division of finance, Bureau of Pensions—Consolidation of pension agencies.

Mr. GARDNER. In case of consolidation, has an estimate been made including the saving in stationery and other necessary expenses?

Mr. KEIFER. I would suggest that Commissioner Warner state specifically his plan of consolidation, and the estimates that would be required in case of the consolidation. We will hear you, Mr. Commissioner, in your own way about that.

Commissioner WARNER. If there is a consolidation here in Washington we should be given time to effect it, though we would call the agencies in as fast as possible. In the case of the agencies which make payment on the 4th day of next April, we would wait until after that April payment had been made by the agencies, and then we would immediately call them in, bringing here their books, their clerks, and all that would be necessary to bring, so as to have them here in time to issue for the next payment in July from this office. For those agencies that pay in May, we would wait until the May payment had been made, and then we would call them in, so that they would be ready to make their next payment from here. That would enable us to effect the consolidation without any delay or inconvenience. We could simply keep the matter going, keep step, without any trouble. it would be necessary to bring some clerks from each agency, possibly all of them to start with, until we could get matters adjusted. The appropriation to start with could be reduced $100,000 on the item of clerk hire for the first year anyway, and it would be more than that after we got the thing adjusted and running in good shape. There would also be a reduction of $72,000 on account of the salaries of agents; but it would be necessary, unless you required the Commissioner of Pensions to sign vouchers, to have a disbursing officer do that, and to give bond. As far as I, personally, am concerned, it would be better for me if the agencies should remain just as they are, as their consolidation would make me additional responsibility and labor; but looking at it from a business point of view—and as if it were my own business—I would consolidate them instantly, or as soon as it could be done. It would be more economical for the Government, and it would work better than to have these agencies scattered all over the country. The work would go smoother, mistakes could be corrected more quickly, information obtained at once, and the records be kept in better shape.

Mr. KEIFER. What have you to say on the subject of delay, if there would be any, in the matter of paying pensioners?

Commissioner WARNER. There would be very little delay. There would be some delay on the first payment, for instance, for the pensioners living in California or on the Pacific coast. The first payment might be delayed a few days, but, in my opinion, not to exceed five; that is, they would get their first payment five days later than if the payment had been made from San Francisco. But after the first payment is made they will receive their money every ninety days—that is, with an interval of ninety days between the payments, just as at present—so that there will be no delay excepting in the places on the Pacific coast and at great distances, and then only in the first payment; otherwise there would be no delay at all.

Mr. KEIFER. You say, Mr. Commissioner, that there would be no delay excepting on the first payment. Would there not be some delay in sending in the voucher after pay day came—that is, after the voucher was passed upon here, would there not be delay in sending the check back?

Commissioner WARNER. That is true; it would take time to send in the voucher; that is true; but there would be the same interval between the payments after the first payment. They would then receive their pay every ninety days.

Mr. KEIFER. But there would be a delay. The pensioner would have to send his pension voucher on a certain date, and it would have to come here and be passed upon and the check sent back. The delay would be the difference between the two different times occasioned by the time consumed in the mails.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes; but only for the first time. After that he would receive his pension every ninety days. The first payment would be postponed about ten days on the Pacific coast—that is, he would receive it ten days later than he would otherwise receive it, but after that he would get it just ninety days from that time.

Mr. GARDNER. What delay would there be to pensioners living east of the Mississippi River.

Commissioner WARNER. The mail east of the Mississippi River would arrive in twenty-four hours, and then it would take twenty-four hours to get the check back. There would also be twenty-four hours consumed each way at Chicago. There would be one more day consumed to Milwaukee. Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis, Louisville, and New York would require twenty-four hours.

Mr. GARDNER. All New England could be reached in twenty-four hours.

Commissioner WARNER. Oh, yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. GARDNER. Substantially all places in New England could be reached in twenty-four hours, though there might be some remote places where it would take longer. How would it be for Texas?

Commissioner WARNER. That is west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. THOMPSON. The naval pensioners in Texas are now paid from this city.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes; and we have never had any complaint from the naval pensioners.

Mr. BOWERS. As I understand it, the result of that delay would be the initial delay on the first payment, and it would establish a new ninety-day period.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes; that is it.

Mr. GARDNER. And the first delay east of the Mississippi River would hardly be perceptible?

Commissioner WARNER. No.

Mr. KEIFER. Is there anything further that you want to say on the subject of these agencies?

Commissioner WARNER. I have nothing to say; they have been running very satisfactorily and the agents have been taking care of the business in good shape. We have no fault to find with any of them.

Mr. GARDNER. Your idea, in case of the consolidation, is to use as many of the clerks now employed by the several agencies as would be necessary to conduct the business.

Commissioner WARNER. Oh, yes. We will want the same clerks. We would bring the majority of them from each agency here with their records so as to have them go right to work. In the Pension Bureau proper we have no more clerks than we need, and we have no one to spare to put in the agencies to do that work. I do not expect to have any clerks to spare as I never fill any vacancies in the Bureau. If there is a vacancy by death, resignation, or dismissal for cause, I do not fill that vacancy. I have complied with the provisions of every appropriation act without being compelled to dismiss a single clerk, and yet our force is 312 less than it was when I took charge of the office. There have been no dismissals except for cause. If I filled vacancies I would be compelled to dismiss. Under this arrangement the clerks feel better, they feel more secure in their places, and they are more happy and contented.

Mr. KEIFER. Do you think it will be practicable to remove the clerks from San Francisco, Topeka, and Knoxville, for instance, to Washington to do this work?

Commissioner WARNER. Oh, yes; they would be glad to come.

Mr. KEIFER. At least as many of them as you need.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes. We ask for an appropriation of $10,000 to effect the transfer of the property and the clerks. We will have to have an extra appropriation of $10,000 for that purpose, but we reduce our appropriations $172,000 on account of agents and clerk hire.

Mr. GARDNER. How long, in case it should be decided to make this consolidation, would it be before the consolidation could be made complete?

Commissioner WARNER. I should think that we ought to have it complete in six months.

Mr. THOMPSON. Take the first group; they pay in April. As the Commissioner has stated, we would bring those in here immediately after the April payment and get ready for the July payment, which could be made from the Bureau. The next group would pay in May, and we would bring them right in and get ready for the next payment from here.

Mr. BOWERS. Then the whole transfer would practically be complete before this appropriation went into effect.

Commissioner WARNER. But we could not commence making the payments until July, when the act would go into effect.

Mr. THOMPSON. The agents draw their salary up to the 1st of July. We would have to get the agencies in here and be ready at that time.

Mr. KEIFER. But it is probable that it would take some months after the beginning of the new fiscal year to effect the consolidation.

Commissioner WARNER. If you make the $10,000 appropriation immediately available, then we could commence consolidation at once.

Mr. BOWERS. The transfer would then be completed earlier, and the reorganization would be carried for some months in this year. I should think that the reorganization could be cared for out of the appropriation made for clerk hire.

Mr. KEIFER. Would there be any other incidental expenses in transferring the agencies here?

Commissioner WARNER. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. THOMPSON. No expense, excepting the shipment of the records in here from the different cities, though we would probably have to buy some furniture, because the furniture has been furnished by the Treasury Department to agents that are located now in Government buildings, and it belongs to that Department.

Commissioner WARNER. But I think that would not amount to much.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Commissioner, will you make a summary of what you think would be necessary to put in our appropriation bill for the next year, or to be made immediately available; and also the appropriation that will be necessary to carry out the plans that you advocate? If you will make such a summary, we will incorporate it in this record.

Commissioner WARNER. We can do that.

Mr. BOWERS. On the first page of Document No. 352, regarding the proposed consolidation, the following language is used: "The annual expenditure on account of the payment of pensions, including the salaries of pension agents, clerk hire, contingent expenses, and the printing of vouchers, checks, is approximately $550,000, an average cost per pensioner of 55 cents per annum. It is estimated that after a consolidation has been completed and in perfect working order all pensioners should be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, located in the city of Washington, with an annual expenditure of, at most, $350,000, a saving of 20 cents per annum per pensioner, or $200,000. After the first year of the consolidation I am of the opinion that the appropriation for the expense of paying pensions could be safely reduced at least $25,000 more."

Mr. KEIFER. What I was after, Mr. Commissioner, and Mr. Bowers' inquiries are in the same direction, is this: Would we make any mistake if we undertook to provide for your plan of consolidation? We should have all of this in the form of a memorandum.

Commissioner WARNER. We have an amendment already drawn.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; you asked me to prepare something showing what would be necessary to add to this bill to make it effective.

Commissioner WARNER. I will read this amendment that we have prepared. [Reads]:

"And provided further, That on and after July 1, 1909, all sums appropriated for the payment of Army and Navy pensions and fees of examining surgeons shall be disbursed by the Commissioner of Pensions through a disbursing clerk to be designated by him with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The disbursing clerk thus designated shall be required to give bond, with good and sufficient surety, for such amount and in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may approve.

"The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and directed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to arrange the pensioners, for the payment of pensions, in three groups, as he may think proper, and may from time to time change any pensioner from one group to another as he may deem convenient for the transaction of the public business. The pensioners in the first group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on January 4, April 4, July 4, and October 4 of each year; the pensioners in the second group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on February 4, May 4, August 4, and November 4 of each year; and the pensioners in the third group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on March 4, June 4, September 4, and December 4 of each year. The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby fully authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to cause payments of pensions to be made for the fractional parts of quarters created by such change, so as to properly adjust all payments as herein provided.

"In case of sickness or unavoidable absence of the disbursing clerk from his office, the Commissioner of Pensions may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, authorize the chief clerk of his office or some other clerk employed therein to temporarily act as such disbursing clerk.

"And with the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior the disbursing clerk may designate and authorize the necessary number of clerks to sign the name of the disbursing clerk to official checks.

"The official bond given by the disbursing clerk shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place.

"The sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available, to meet the expenses of carrying into effect the changes herein provided for."

Mr. BOWERS. You have not suggested, Mr. Commissioner, just exactly how much, in case this consolidation goes into effect, this estimate for clerk hire and so forth can be safely cut.

Commissioner WARNER. I think it would be safe to cut it $100,000. I think possibly it could be cut much more, but that is safe.

Mr. BOWERS. You have the expense of the reorganization, of course, to bear out of the clerk-hire appropriation.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. And there is also the extra work involved in making the consolidation.

Commissioner WARNER. I think it would work smoother than you imagine; that is, I think in the work of bringing the agencies in, and changing the location, everything would go smoothly.

Mr. GARDNER. Will you have plenty of room in the Pension building?

Commissioner WARNER. Thank you for that suggestion. We will have room in the event that we are allowed the entire Pension building for pension purposes; that is, if they surrender us the whole building. We have the board of appeals in there now of the Secretary's office, and one room is occupied by the Indian Office. If those rooms were restored to us we would have plenty of room.

Mr. KEIFER. That could be done without any legislation.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes. I think the Secretary would do that.

Mr. KEIFER. I notice that there has been some effort made to secure part of that building for the purpose of storing away old patent models. Do you think that they ought to be there?

Commissioner WARNER. I do not want them in there, but if the Secretary wants them, then I do. Anything he wants I am for.

Mr. GARDNER. Your thought is that everything strictly connected with the operation of the Pension Bureau should be put under one roof?

Commissioner WARNER. All under one roof.

Mr. GARDNER. So that the Bureau would have ready access to all of the papers in case questions arise.

Mr. WARNER. Yes. It will be a great convenience to have all of the pensions paid from that building. In case we want to know anything about a change of residence of a man who has been paid from a San Francisco agency, or any change regarding his condition whatever, we would be able to get that information at once. As it is now we have to write a letter and wait for the reply, for we must first communicate with San Francisco. We would be able, in the event of the consolidation, to get any information in regard to any of these cases within a few minutes, no matter whether it related to a pensioner on the Pacific coast, in Iowa, or anywhere else.

Mr. GARDNER. Besides the New York office, where you rent rooms, is there any complaint about any of the quarters in other places where these agencies are now located?

Commissioner WARNER. Occasionally we hear some complaint about the amount of room that they have, the conveniences, and so forth, though I could not specify the agencies at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Columbus agency was very much crowded. Congress has made an appropriation for a new building there, and pending the completion of that building the Treasury Department has rented a building and is giving us sufficient room.

Commissioner WARNER. I would like to say that there is not a more pleasant or a more healthful office building in the United State for clerical work than the Pension building here in Washington. Every room has an outside exposure; we have large corridors inside, with a very large court, making substantially two outside exposures. It is the healthiest and pleasantest office for clerical work that I know of.

Mr. GARDNER. Your judgment is that this consolidation would be ideal for handling the whole pension business, for the adjustment of pensions, the concentration of the correspondence, and everything connected with them? You believe that putting it all in that building is the best possible arrangement?

Commissioner WARNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARDNER. You could not suggest anything more perfect for the operation of the whole pension machinery?

Commissioner WARNER. No; it would all be in a nutshell instead of being scattered all over the United States as it is now with eighteen different agencies. The pensions would all be paid from here the same as the interest on the public debt.

Mr. BOWERS. And would there not be some saving in the matter of duplication of records? As it is now, a record has to be kept in both the central Pension Office and in the branch offices.

Commissioner WARNER. A great saving; yes. As it is now, the certificate is recorded here, then it is sent out to the pension agency and it is recorded there, and there is considerable duplication all the way through. Under the consolidation arrangement we would have it all in one office, and that would be the end of it. It would save clerk hire, time, and labor. If this were a private business no business man would hesitate ten seconds in coming to a decision as to what he would do. He would consolidate it. While with an official like myself, in the Government service, and for whom it is going to make additional work, he would not be very anxious for it, and personally I do not care anything about the consolidation, yet in the interest of the Government I think it would be a very good thing.

Mr. KEIFER. Are all naval pensions paid from here—from the Washington office?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Washington agency pays the District of Columbia, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, West Virginia, and all pensioners residing in foreign countries. In addition to that it pays the naval pensioners from the Knoxville district, which comprises all of the Southern States as far west as Texas. Naval pensions are also paid by the Chicago, the San Francisco, Boston, New York, and Philadelphia offices.

Mr. KEIFER. But the other pension agencies do not pay naval pensions?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES R. GARFIELD, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Secretary, we have examined this question of consolidation, and have heard the views of the Commissioner upon it. He has outlined the plan and offered his suggestions as to certain reductions in appropriations and so on, in case the plan of consolidation is agreed upon. We would like to hear from you now, if you have any suggestions to make.

Secretary GARFIELD. I have gone over this matter very fully with Commissioner Warner, and he has told me the conditions in his office. I have likewise had the reports from different inspectors, who have been going over matters with the Commissioner's officers and with the agents in the field regarding the conditions.

As a general proposition, it seems to me that it would be wise administration to consolidate these agencies into one agency here at Washington. The reasons that lead me to reach this conclusion in brief are: That by the concentration and centralization of the handling of this work here in Washington, with the present organization in the Pension Office, and with the possibility of the introduction, as we could then, of certain mechanical devices for the handling of these hundreds of thousands of vouchers and certificates, we could, without interfering at all with the expedition with which the pensioners receive their claims, transact all of that business here and mail the checks to the various parts of the country, receiving the vouchers quite as quickly as it is now done under separate agencies. The laws as they now stand have done away, of course, with much of the difficulty in the general administration of the settling of claims and passing upon claims. The office is nearer up to date than it ever has been before in the history of this work. The pension appeals are absolutely current, they being passed upon almost immediately. The transaction of business within the office is of such a character that the Commissioner has been able, as he has doubtless told you, to reduce the force in accordance with the requirements of the appropriation bill, and he looks forward to a still further reduction of force.

The saving, as we figure it, will be something over $200,000, and I believe it will be even more than that when we put into effect all of the systematized business methods that can be put into effect if this work is brought here. I believe that the saving would be nearer $350,000 a year, in administration, and without any loss to the pensioners in expeditiously receiving their pensions, and without in any way interfering with the handling of the present business in the settlement of claims presented. Of course the great saving will be immediately in the salaries, but in the cost of maintaining the different agencies there will be likewise a very large saving. The Commissioner has found that there are differences in method obtaining in some of the agencies. These differences in method have resulted in a very great increased cost in some agencies as compared with the cost in other agencies, and by adopting the best methods that have been evolved in all of the agencies and applying them to the one central agency we can reduce the cost of administration per pension to the point that will be, I believe, lower than at present exists in the main offices. That is typical, is it not?

Commissioner WARNER. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. And where they pay most of the pensions.

Secretary GARFIELD. Yes. And the cost to the pensioner is less than in any one of the other agencies. It resolves itself simply down to this proposition: Of doing business by the wholesale, where you can do it cheaper, with better administration, and can do it more efficiently than through the agents throughout the country under our present system. And the present handling of mail through the rural free delivery is such that it really makes no difference where these checks are mailed from so far as the ease with which the pensioner obtains his check is concerned.

Of course there are constantly arising cases of offices where the number of pensioners has gone away below the point that warrants economical administration. The lowest agencies are those in New Hampshire and in Maine, and they are down to about 15,000 or 16,000 each, are they not?

Commissioner WARNER. One is 16,000 and one 17,000.

Secretary GARFIELD. And below the number that results in efficient and economical administration, and if we begun by dropping off those—of course you gentlemen will appreciate the difficulty of taking one and not taking another. It seems to me that we ought to do the thing at one time and do it thoroughly, so as to result in this saving of expenditure. We could abolish nine without any difficulty whatever and consolidate those with the others.

Mr. GARDNER. The feeling obtaining among the veterans is that this consolidation would delay their receiving their pensions. What have you to say as to that?

Secretary GARFIELD. From all information that we have been able to get, I believe that would not be true. I think we could quite as expeditiously handle them as they are handled at present.

Mr. GARDNER. Then another objection that obtains among the veterans to a considerable extent is that they would be inconvenienced; for example, a man makes out his papers, and there is an error in executing his voucher. Now they send to the nearest agency and the voucher is corrected. What have you to say about the delay that might arise there?

Secretary GARFIELD. Without doubt it would take the additional time for the mail to bring that voucher to Washington above the time that would be used in carrying it to the nearest agency, but I am advised that those cases would make a very small per cent of the total number of cases handled, and while it might result, and doubtless would result, in delay to some individual, yet the benefit to the service as a whole would very much more than compensate for the individual discomfort or delay.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it your judgment that in case of consolidation the payments had better be made by disbursing officers to be appointed, for example, by yourself, the Secretary of the Interior, and that the whole thing should be under the direction of the Pension Commissioner?

Secretary GARFIELD. I believe so.

Mr. GARDNER. That would lead to unification of administration?

Secretary GARFIELD. To unification of administration and harmony of administration, and it would do away with what at present is, I believe, a serious duplication of clerical work. I think it is unnecessary to do a great deal of the clerical work that is done now in the reporting of the agencies to the central office here and the handling of all that work over again. I think it would be a plan by which much of that duplication could be done away with.

Mr. GARDNER. What would be the effect of the consolidation in this way upon the duplication of work and hence simplification and reduction of expense?

Secretary GARFIELD. It would be a very great gain in simplification and avoid a great deal of duplication.

Mr. GARDNER. And consequently it would reduce the current expenses of conducting the office?

Secretary GARFIELD. And necessarily there would be greater economy. Every time we can avoid duplication, every time we can simplify, every time we can get greater efficiency, we necessarily get greater economy.

Mr. GARDNER. You spoke of some mechanical devices. Have you any of those for the expedition of work in any of the present agencies?

Secretary GARFIELD. Some of the agencies have them already.

Mr. GARDNER. For example?

Secretary GARFIELD. The addressograph is one, and the adding machine is another. Those are all matters that save a great deal of clerical labor. If we retain all of the agencies, and introduce these machines into each agency, it would make a much larger expense of course; whereas, if the agencies are all brought here, one machine can handle a very large amount of the work instead of different machines scattered about through the different agencies. Wherever those mechanical devices have been installed—I do not recollect the number of agencies now using them—but they have added efficiency and expedition to the offices.

Mr. GARDNER. And do you think there would be a reduction in the per capita expense?

Secretary GARFIELD. The greater number of people supplied from one office the cheaper per capita. The machines can address 100,000 at the same expense as that of addressing 10,000 in the old way.

Mr. GARDNER. Am I correct in the understanding that in the smallest agencies you have to have the same machines, the same set of books, the same duplications that you have now in the larger agencies?

Secretary GARFIELD. That is true; yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And therefore there is a much greater proportion of clerical hire for a small agency, as to the number paid, than in the larger agencies.

Secretary GARFIELD. Yes; measured by the number of pensions.

Mr. GARDNER. I notice a very important statement here with regard to the loss of vouchers through the mails, and that many of them have never been recovered; and also that some accounts have never been settled because of that. Would the consolidation lead to an elimination of that?

Secretary GARFIELD. I do not know. A single voucher is just as liable to be lost in the mail coming here——

Mr. GARDNER. But not a large number of vouchers?

Secretary GARFIELD. Not a large number that have been forwarded from an agency.

Mr. GARDNER. And those have been lost?

Secretary GARFIELD. Those have been lost; yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to make a statement about the lost vouchers. That refers to the vouchers lost in the mails after they have been paid, and in transmission from the pension agency to the central government here. They get lost in the mails, and then it is very difficult to get a new voucher from the pensioner. Before the pension agent can get credit for the payment he must secure a duplicate voucher from the pensioner.

Commissioner WARNER. That would be all done here, right in the city, and there would be no danger of losing the voucher.

Mr. BOWERS. Under the present system the vouchers go to the pension agency, and after having been paid by the agent they are forwarded to Washington?

Secretary GARFIELD. Yes.

Mr. BOWERS. That involves two passages through the mails, while if they came here direct there would be only one passage through the mail, one trip for the voucher, and the risk of loss would be reduced?

Secretary GARFIELD. Without doubt; yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Permit me to say that if the pensioner's voucher is lost before it reaches the agency, a duplicate voucher is sent him right away and there is no loss whatever.

Mr. KEIFER. He could not get paid until he got the duplicate?

Commissioner WARNER. When we have received that voucher we would send the voucher right over to the Treasury and it would be settled.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Would a loss of that character be a personal loss of the agent?

Secretary GARFIELD. We can not settle accounts until it is straightened out. This would reduce our letters very largely to the Treasury Department. Instead of having eighteen settlements, we would have one settlement.

Mr. KEIFER. Can you see, Mr. Secretary, that there would be a loss of time in the matter of paying some portion of the pensioners on account of the distance from Washington, and would not that only apply to the initial payment? It would postpone the day of receipt of the pension beyond the regular pension pay day once, and after that he would get it the same time?

Secretary GARFIELD. Exactly the same. There would not be any difference in the interval between payments. It would be the first payment only that would be affected by that.

Mr. KEIFER. I notice from your report, Mr. Commissioner, that you pay to pensioners in foreign countries $724,434. These pensioners live, as I have counted, in sixty-seven different foreign countries. Are those pensioners paid from any agency save the one here?

Commissioner WARNER. They are paid from one agency, the Washington agency. That is a case where it is all done from one agency to points all over the world, and the only people paid from different agencies are those in the United States. The naval pensioners are paid from six different agencies, while the foreign pensioners are paid from one agency and all the others from eighteen different agencies.

Mr. GARDNER. What is the method of distributing vouchers and pension checks under the present conditions?

Mr. THOMPSON. At present all vouchers are printed for each of the agencies by the Government Printing Office. The checks are printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and these vouchers must be mailed from the Bureau of Pensions to the eighteen different agencies. The checks are sent direct from the Treasury.

Mr. GARDNER. And the vouchers are sent by the Bureau, so that there is a double sending?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. These vouchers and checks are printed up in different denominations for each agency; for instance, we print so many vouchers for each agent at $18, $20, $30, and so on up to the highest rate of pensioner. That duplicates the number required for each agency, making from forty to fifty different forms of vouchers and checks required by each agency.

Mr. GARDNER. What would be the advantage under the consolidation in this respect, if any?

Mr. THOMPSON. It would reduce this operation just seventeen times. In printing we would print in larger quantities. Instead of printing 1,000 of one form for each agency, we would print 10,000 for one agency.

Mr. GARDNER. And then send them directly from here to the individual pensioners.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; the vouchers would be sent directly to each pensioner from Washington.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak on the bill. I wish to suggest in a preliminary way that in my remarks on the pending appropriation bill I shall refer to the matter of the retention of pension agencies, and I shall have something to say in addition to what appears in the hearings before the subcommittee on appropriations and in addition to what appears in the report of the Committee on Appropriations in support of this bill. On account of one pension agent in the United States living a few miles from the city of Washington, contending that days and weeks of time would be lost in paying pensioners at his home, it became necessary to make further investigations, or rather demonstrations, and therefore this matter was fully gone into. Much that I will say will probably be regarded unnecessary after the able speech of my colleague on the committee, Mr. BOWERS. One thing I now am prepared to differ from him about, and that is that he has adopted the statement of the Commissioner and also the statement of the Secretary of the Interior as to the amount of money that would be saved. I believe, and they now believe, that the amount of money that would be saved by the reduction would be at least twice as much as they believed at the time they made their statements to the committee. This concludes what I desire to say in a preliminary way.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, let me get to that, and at the close of my remarks the gentleman may ask any question he wants, but I will have in my remarks a demonstration of the question that he wants to ask.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. I presume that was mere inference which the gentleman drew about the cost.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no; no inference in it at all. I can convince the gentleman himself.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. It must have been inference. It certainly was not the result of any inquiry the gentleman made.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; letters, investigations, calculations, and estimates made with the utmost care since this report was made.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. An entirely ex parte inquiry, calculations made by the Commissioner of Pensions and by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEIFER. And one other person, if the gentleman please.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Well, one other, the chief clerk or somebody up there.

Mr. KEIFER. Add another still, for I myself took the report and made investigations for myself, and when I get through the gentleman will not dispute them.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. An entirely ex parte inquiry.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; I am always ex parte when I am examining a matter. Now, I will come to the pension agency later.

This bill, the largest one in amount for paying pensions ever reported from an Appropriation Committee of this House, if enacted into law, will appropriate $150,000,000, the full estimate for paying pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. Nothing is added on account of the proposed widows' pension law recently passed by this House. The reduction of the present pension roll by death and other causes may result in this proposed appropriation being sufficient to pay all pensioners under existing law for the next fiscal year.

The bill also carries an appropriation of $500,000 for fees of examining surgeons, which is $100,000 less than the appropriation for that purpose for the present fiscal year and other fiscal years; $4,000 for salary of a pension agent—$68,000 less than was appropriated for salaries of pension agents this fiscal year and for each of many years past.

It carries an appropriation of $335,000 ($100,000 less than the estimate) for clerk hire. Nothing is included for rent or the examination of agencies. The reasons for this exclusion and these reductions will be stated later. The appropriations included in the bill amount to $150,869,000.

The appropriations so far for the payment of pensions this (1908) fiscal year are $145,000,000, and the amount disbursed in paying pensions in the last (1907) fiscal year was $138,155,412.46. The cost of paying pensions is to be added to these sums.

The bill carries more for the payment of pensions than was disbursed for that purpose in any previous year, save in the year 1893, when the disbursements for pensions reached $156,906,637.94.

The number of pensioners on the roll at the end of the fiscal year 1907 was 967,371; at the end of the fiscal year 1893 the number was 966,012. The highest number on the roll at the end of any year was for the fiscal year 1905 when it reached 998,441. The maximum on the pension roll was in the year 1905, when at the end of January it reached 1,004,196, the highest ever reached. The number of pensioners on the roll June 30, 1907, was the smallest since 1893. Notwithstanding there was issued prior to June 30, 1907, under the act of February 6, 1907 (McCumber Act), 116,239 certificates to pensioners, yet the whole number of original certificates issued of all classes under all acts for the fiscal year 1907 was only 29,945.

There was, however, a decrease of $844,875.79 in the disbursement for pensions in the fiscal year 1907 over that of 1906. The increase in the annual value of the pension roll as it stood at the end of the fiscal year 1907 by reason of claims allowed under the McCumber Act would be $6,394,517 if it retained its status as to number, but it is subject to increase by the allowance of additional claims and to large reductions by deaths and other causes.

The total number of certificates issued under the McCumber Act prior to January 1, 1908, was 281,475, which increased the value of the pension roll $15,018,475, and there will be a further increase by reason of claims under that act yet to be adjudicated, but the increase will be subject to a very large decrease by death and other causes. The Commissioner estimates that the deaths of this class of pensioners will reach 1,000 per month. Out of the number pensioned under the McCumber Act prior to July 1, 1907, there were 624 deaths prior to that date and there have now been above 4,000 deaths among those who were pensioned under that act.

The total decrease in the pension roll during the fiscal year 1907 was, from all causes, 49,634; the deaths were 45,768, and 3,866 were dropped from the rolls for other causes. The deaths of civil-war pensioners were, in that fiscal year, 31,201, leaving, at the end of that year, still on the pension roll, survivors of that war, 644,338. This number, through deaths mainly, went down by February 1, 1908, to 633,388.

It is impossible now to very closely estimate the total number of pensioners that will be on the pension roll under existing laws, or the amount required to pay them, for the fiscal year 1909, but it is believed by some persons that the $150,000,000 carried in this bill will be sufficient, and perhaps go far toward paying the widows whose pensions will be increased and those who will be added to the roll should the Sulloway bill, which is now in conference between the Senate and this House, become a law.

Our Government has been liberal in paying Army and Navy pensions. There has been disbursed since the Government was founded, and prior to July 1, 1907, for pensions of all wars and for the regular establishment $3,598,015,723.69, and of this amount only $96,445,444.23 were disbursed prior to July 1, 1865. The disbursements for the payment of pensions on account of the civil war alone were $3,389,135,449.54 (about half the prime cost of the war to the United States), while the disbursements for all other wars and for the regular establishment were only $208,880,274.15. These figures do not include $110,051,513.73, the cost of paying pensions.

There is now living no soldier or soldier's widow of the Revolutionary war, and there is no pensioned soldier living of the war of 1812, but there was at the end of the last fiscal year (1907) on the pension roll 558 widows of soldiers of that war. The last survivor of the war of the Revolution was Daniel F. Bakeman, who died in Freedom, Cattaraugus County, N. Y., April 5, 1869, aged 109 years 6 months and 8 days; and the last surviving widow of that war, Esther S. Damon, died at Plymouth Union, Vt., November 11, 1906, aged 92 years. There are still three daughters of soldiers of that war on the pension rolls by special acts of Congress.

Our Government has also been liberal in other ways to the soldiers and sailors of all wars prior to the civil war in the matter of land warrants. There have been issued—chiefly to Mexican war soldiers—598,651 such warrants, covering 68,786,310 acres of land, or, in area, 107,478 square miles.

The number of pensioners on the rolls June 30, 1907, and the total payments to which they were then entitled, was:

	Number.	Amount.
Residents of the States and Territories	962,157	$137,288,640.08
Residents of insular possessions	124	17,820.04
Residents of foreign countries	5,090	724,434.10

The pensioners are paid from eighteen pension agencies, and the number of pensioners and the money disbursed at each agency for the fiscal year 1907 is shown by the following table:

Location.	Name of agent.	Pensioners June 30, 1907.	Money disbursed in 1907.
Augusta	Selden Connor	17,303	$2,686,558.43
Boston	Augustus J. Hoitt	59,236	7,630,854.68
Buffalo	Charles A. Orr	45,039	6,176,347.15
Chicago	Charles Bent	75,099	10,691,683.14
Columbus	William R. Warnock	95,829	14,634,797.72
Concord	Grovenor A. Curtice	16,117	2,562,525.25
Des Moines	William V. Willcox	53,000	7,706,530.20
Detroit	Oscar A. Janes	40,685	6,352,187.88
Indianapolis	Albert O. Marsh	60,903	10,092,201.20
Knoxville	William Rule	63,890	8,545,151.74
Louisville	Andrew T. Wood	26,854	3,842,306.70
Milwaukee	Edwin D. Coe	48,843	7,018,817.72
New York City	Michael Kerwin	53,883	6,991,041.70
Philadelphia	St. Clair A. Mulholland	58,295	7,654,515.46
Pittsburg	Daniel Ashworth	44,496	6,287,191.48
San Francisco	Jesse B. Fuller	42,713	5,607,014.91
Topeka	Wilder S. Metcalf	111,508	15,807,638.24
Washington	John R. King	53,640	7,743,527.62
Total		967,371	138,030,894.22

It is of interest to note that there was paid from the United States Treasury the last fiscal year to pensioners residing in—

Australia	$11,088.33	Japan	$3,003.27
Austria-Hungary	5,040.62	Liberia	1,927.53
Belgium	2,880.47	Mexico	23,508.44
Canada	367,510.30	Norway	8,760.47
Chile	2,466.00	Russia	2,223.00
China	2,507.37	St. Helena	180.00
Cuba	8,216.07	Scotland	14,272.68
Denmark	5,304.70	Spain	120.00
England	53,918.60	Sweden	8,072.33
France	9,360.73	Switzerland	9,792.18
Germany	85,318.30	Turkey	1,469.00
Ireland	69,376.30	Wales	3,260.73
Italy	7,112.87

There are pensioners residing in about forty other foreign countries—sixty-seven in all—the total amount paid (1907) to pensioners residing in foreign countries being $724,434.10.

Quoting from a recent communication to me (February 19, 1908) from the Commissioner of Pensions, it appears that:

1. The decrease in the annual value of the civil war invalid-pension roll on account of death during the fiscal year 1907 was approximately

$4,500,000. The decrease in the annual value of this roll by reason of pensioners being dropped for other causes than death during the last fiscal year was $65,000.

2. The increase to the annual value of the pension roll by reason of allowances of claims under the act of February 6, 1907, to those persons already on the roll, to June 30, 1907, was $6,127,769. The number of original claims allowed under the act of February 6, 1907—that is, to persons who had never been pensioned before—was 1,794, the annual value of which was $266,748.

In this connection you are advised that about one-third of the claims which were filed under the act of February 6, 1907, were adjudicated by the Bureau prior to July 1. The increase in the disbursements for pensions during the present fiscal year over the corresponding months of the previous year is as follows:

July	$628,481.00
August	854,835.06
September	708,772.93
October	872,558.73
November	1,341,958.78
December	1,388,313.33

This makes a total increase in the disbursements for pensions by pension agents during the first six months of the present fiscal year, as compared with the first six months of the previous year, of $5,794,920.33. The appropriation for the present fiscal year is $145,000,000. The present indications are that there will be a deficiency in the amount required to pay pensions during the present fiscal year of about $7,000,000.

Pensioners of all classes residing, June 30, 1907, in the eleven States that seceded in 1861 are, in number and amount paid, as follows:

	Number.	Paid.
Alabama	3,824	$499,085.97
Arkansas	10,760	1,442,947.15
Florida	3,785	512,993.30
Georgia	3,549	472,769.26
Louisiana	6,519	820,723.82
Mississippi	4,813	625,272.37
North Carolina	4,133	553,732.64
South Carolina	2,014	244,730.54
Tennessee	18,898	2,711,531.96
Texas	8,850	1,147,027.27
Virginia	8,894	1,282,490.05
Total	76,079	10,313,307.33

The States having, on June 30, 1907, pensioners who were entitled to receive above $5,000,000 were:

	Number.	Paid.
Ohio	95,683	$14,657,709.11
Pennsylvania	96,592	13,088,638.09
New York	82,818	11,181,458.18
Indiana	59,669	9,849,908.24
Illinois	68,707	9,746,699.53
Missouri	49,335	6,990,729.74
Michigan	40,831	6,358,422.91
Kansas	38,108	5,423,874.54
Massachusetts	40,325	5,279,471.32
Iowa	34,091	5,262,921.48

The value of the pension roll at that date in no other State reached $4,000,000. Only the States of California, Kentucky, New Jersey, and Wisconsin then exceeded $3,000,000 but less than $4,000,000, and only the States of Minnesota, Nebraska, and Tennessee then exceeded $2,000,000 but less than $3,000,000.

The number of pensioners paid from the different pension agencies varies from 16,117 at the Concord agency, the smallest, to 111,508 at the Topeka agency, the largest. The disbursements at the former were, last fiscal year, $2,562,525.25 and at the latter $15,807,638.24.

PENSION AGENCIES—COST OF PAYING PENSIONERS.

The cost per capita of all kinds, including salary, clerk hire, and contingent expenses, at each of the following pension agencies in last (1907) fiscal year was: At Augusta, 76 cents; Concord, 77½ cents; Detroit, 58 cents; Columbus, 45½ cents; Topeka, 42½ cents; Philadelphia, 53 cents; Pittsburg, 56¼ cents; Chicago, 51¼ cents; Knoxville, 51 cents; New York, 65 cents. It will be noted that generally the larger the agency the less it costs to maintain it.

The cost of all kinds at the Washington agency in paying a pensioner, treating the examining surgeons (4,709) as though pensioners, in the fiscal year 1907 was 51 cents. In Washington there is much extra labor and loss of time in paying the 5,090 pensioners residing in 67 foreign countries and the 124 residing in our insular possessions, to whom are paid from the Washington agency $724,434.10 of the former class, and $17,820.04 of the latter. Notwithstanding this extra labor, the cost of paying a pensioner at the Philadelphia agency is greater than at the Washington agency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the cost per capita is less in Washington than in Philadelphia?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; it is less in Washington than in Philadelphia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, from the data, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, the cost per capita at Washington is 63.13 cents and at Philadelphia is 53.08 cents.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is talking about the cost for clerk hire.

Mr. STAFFORD. The cost for clerk hire including the salary of the pension agent.

Mr. KEIFER. I am talking about the cost of the agency, and the gentleman is referring to another matter. Let me get through with this and he will understand.

The cost for clerk hire alone in the last fiscal year in paying a pensioner at the Augusta agency was 53 cents, at Concord 52 cents, and at Detroit 47 cents, while at the Columbus agency it was 40 cents, and at the Topeka agency it was 39 cents, and at the Philadelphia agency 45¼ cents, and at the Pittsburg agency 46¼ cents, and at the Chicago agency 42½ cents, at the Knoxville agency 44½ cents, and at the Washington agency 47 cents.

There was paid at the Topeka agency the last fiscal year 111,508 pensioners, which was in excess of those paid in the four agencies of Augusta, Concord, Detroit, and Louisville by 10,549. The number of pensioners (95,829) paid at the Columbus agency exceeds those paid at the Augusta (17,303), Concord (16,533), and the Louisville (27,544) agencies by 34,449.

The cost for salaries ($12,000) and clerk hire ($36,821.63) at these three agencies in the last fiscal year was $48,821.63, while at the Columbus agency the cost for salaries and clerk hire was $43,102.39, less than at the three named by $5,719.24, though it paid 34,449 more pensioners than were paid at the three agencies named. The excess of pensioners paid at Columbus over the three named was greater by 613 than the whole number of pensioners paid at Augusta and Concord.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that the average salaries paid to the pension agents in Washington is about $1,210 a year and that the average salaries paid at all the other agencies is considerably less than $1,000 a year?

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman did sot mean to ask the question he put. He wants to know about salaries paid to pension agents; he means clerks.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I mean clerks that are paid for the disbursement of pensions.

Mr. KEIFER. The answer to the question is a little difficult, because they are not all paid alike; they are not all paid an average. I am inclined to think that on account of our legislation here—which ought to be corrected—there is some difference in the pay of clerks in Washington and in some agencies, but not in all of them——

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman ascertained what the average cost of the clerks are, taking all the agencies together?

Mr. KEIFER. No; I am taking the aggregate cost of paying the pensioners.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman does not know what the average now is?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know just now what the average is. The payments for the fiscal year 1907 at the Columbus agency to pensioners amounted to $14,634,797.72, and the aggregate payments at the Augusta, Concord, and Detroit agencies only amounted to $11,691,271.56. These facts conclusively show that great economy must result from a consolidation.

If there is any good reason for maintaining small pension agencies in the interest of the pensioners, then we should establish at least fifty agencies, each of which would pay more than is now paid at some of the existing agencies. There should be on this theory at least five more in Ohio. We do not now regard distance from the pensioner. The Knoxville agency pays pensioners residing in ten States—the Carolinas to and including Texas, and the intervening Gulf and other States—and all the Navy pensioners residing within that agency are now paid from Washington. Topeka pays the States of Kansas, Colorado, and Missouri, the Territories of New Mexico and Indian Territory, and the now State of Oklahoma. San Francisco pays the States of California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming; the Territories of Alaska, Arizona, and Hawaii; the Philippines, Guam, and the Samoan Islands belonging to the United States, including all Navy pensioners residing in these States and Territories.

Here are magnificent distances, and yet we have no cry of neglect or delay. Twelve of the eighteen agencies do not pay the Navy pensioners residing therein.

The difference in the time of a pensioner residing in Philadelphia receiving his payment under the proposed plan and under the old would not be noticeable, and the delay or difference in payments to pensioners in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the New England States would rarely be over twenty-four hours. And, as has been explained, there would be no difference at all, after the first payment, under the proposed plan; under the new plan the pensioner would still receive his pension every three months precisely the same as now, the date of receiving the payment in each paying month only being changed.

The claim is made that the payment of pensions in Washington (where there was paid last fiscal year 58,295 pensioners) is greater per capita than at some other agencies. This is only seemingly true as to the two large agencies at Topeka and Columbus. I have already shown that in the payment of 4,709 examining surgeons and in the payment of the 5,000 pensioners who reside in foreign countries from the Washington agency there is a large extra expense and much increase in labor and considerable loss of time due to several causes, best stated by the Commissioner in a letter to me of February 5, 1908. I quote from it:

> The extra labor in the payment of pensioners residing in foreign countries is due to several causes—difficulty in determining the correct post-office addresses and in addressing the envelopes, the addresses in most cases being three times as long as the post-office addresses in the United States, the work of comparison is three times as great, and in addition to this constant reference must be made to guides in order to determine the correct spelling of the names and addresses, many of which are in the language of the country, requiring translation. The labor involved in the examination of pension vouchers executed in foreign countries is from three to five times as great as that involved in the examination of vouchers executed in this country. Vouchers may be executed in the United States before any officer authorized to administer oaths for general purposes and before any fourth-class postmaster. If such officer is authorized to use a seal, the impression of his seal upon the voucher is taken as prima facie evidence of his authority, without further verification. In foreign countries vouchers may be executed before an ambassador, minister, consul, or other consular officer of the United States, or before any civil officer of the country duly authorized to administer oaths or to authenticate extra-judicial documents, and whose official character and signature shall be authenticated by the certificate of an ambassador, minister, consul, or other consular officer of the United States. On account of the variation in the laws of different countries relative to the officers authorized to administer oaths or to take affirmations constant reference is required in the examination of vouchers executed in such countries to determine whether such vouchers were executed in accordance with the regulations relative thereto. While franked envelopes are used in addressing domestic pensioners, postage stamps must be affixed to all communications to pensioners residing in foreign countries. The affixing of these stamps, as well as the weighing of doubtful letters or packets, also require extra time and labor.
> It is estimated, therefore, that the pension agency in this city could, with its present number of employees, pay with equal facility 68,000 pensioners in the United States if it were not required to pay the pensioners residing in foreign countries and the fees of examining surgeons. This would reduce the cost per pensioner to 41 cents.
>
> The number of pensioners on the rolls of the Knoxville agency—the nearest in size which can be fairly compared with the Washington agency—was at the close of the last fiscal year 63,890, and the amount disbursed for clerk hire was $28,153.50, or $305.70 more than paid at the Washington agency. The amount of work required at the Washington agency, in view of the foreign pensioners and fees of examining surgeons, is believed to be greater than that required at the Knoxville agency.
> The number of clerks employed at the Philadelphia agency is 26; at the Knoxville agency, 27; and at the Washington agency, 25. While the average salary paid at the Washington agency is greater than that at the Philadelphia agency, this is due to the fact that the Washington agent prefers to conduct the business with a smaller number of clerks and the payment of higher salaries, while the Philadelphia agent prefers a larger number of clerks and lower salaries.

The admitted saving the first year of $225,000 would be sufficient to pay 1,600 widows, or other pensioners, $12 per month. The much larger saving each year in the future would proportionately enable the Government, if it desired, to increase the pension roll.

All months will have, under the proposed plan, pension payments on the 4th of the month.

At each agency now there are eight months in the year when no payments are made. Payments are now made on January 4, April 4, July 4, and October 4 at the following pension agencies: Buffalo, Chicago, Concord, Des Moines, Milwaukee, Pittsburg—six.

On February 4, May 4, August 4, and November 4 at Indianapolis, Knoxville, Louisville, New York City, Philadelphia, Topeka—six.

On March 4, June 4, September 4, December 4 at Boston, Augusta, Columbus, Detroit, Washington City, San Francisco—six.

Under the plan to pay all pensioners from Washington one-twelfth of the pensioners would be paid monthly. Under the present plan no payments are made in the months of February, March, May, June, August, September, November, and December, eight months in the year, from the agencies at Buffalo, Chicago, Concord, Des Moines, Milwaukee, and Pittsburg. And no payments are made in the months of March and April, June and July, September and October, December and January, eight months in the year, from the agencies of Indianapolis, Knoxville, Louisville, New York City, Philadelphia, and Topeka. And no payments are made in the months of April and May, July and August, October and November, and January and February, eight months in the year, from the agencies at Boston, Augusta, Columbus, Detroit, Washington City, and San Francisco. If all pensioners are paid from one place, the same clerks can work on each month's payments.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The gentleman does not desire to convey the idea that there are eight months in the year when any pensioner does not receive any pension? They are paid every three months, are they not?

Mr. KEIFER. I have stated that, but there is left still eight months that they are not paid except there may be occasionally one where the voucher was not promptly sent in.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Eight months when they are not paid, when they are paid every ninety days?

Mr. KEIFER. I am only speaking now of the importance of getting rid of keeping up an establishment of eighteen places in the United States to pay every three months in the year, whereas if we had one establishment in the city of Washington or somewhere else, the same clerks and the same pension agent could pay one-twelfth every month, thereby saving a large amount of expense.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEIFER. My time will not permit.

Mr. STAFFORD. What number of clerks employed at these respective agencies are not employed during that time of the year?

Mr. KEIFER. What are they doing? is the answer.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are engaged all the while. If the gentleman has any acquaintance with the execution of business in these agencies, he will know they are performing their work all the time.

Mr. KEIFER. I can not stop to dispute with the gentleman. We know, as I have said in my remarks, they are engaged in preparatory work, but they are not needed in that one-half the intervening time.

The number of clerks now employed and required to transact the pension-agency business is about 430, as the Commissioner of Pensions advises me, and he gives it as his opinion that all the pensioners can be paid from the Pension Bureau with at least 125 less clerks, or by the employment of about 300 clerks only.

There are now eighteen chief clerks, while under the new plan but one would be required. And now eighteen machines and outfits for addressing envelopes, and so forth, will be required, while if the agencies are consolidated only one such machine will be required. One clerk with an addressing machine can address as many envelopes as twelve clerks by the ordinary method.

A somewhat similar condition exists in regard to adding machines. They have been found almost indispensable in the conduct of the agency business. If the agencies are consolidated, not more than half as many adding machines will be required as are now necessary. There will be much saving in clerical work, delays avoided, and time saved in the payment of original pensions.

Pension certificates, when issued here, are recorded in the Bureau here—a record made of them. The certificates are then sent to the different agencies in the jurisdiction of which the pensioners live. They are again recorded there—a duplication of the work—and then, after being recorded, they are mailed with the vouchers for the first payment to the pensioners. On account of the enormous amount of work made by the McCumber Act the pension agencies (except the one in Washington) are, on an average, thirty days behind in forwarding the certificates and vouchers to the pensioners. That is, they have not yet forwarded the certificates which they received thirty days ago, not being able to get up the work. This, as most, if not all, Members of this House know, has led to much complaint and even dissatisfaction and to much unnecessary correspondence, because the pensioner receives his voucher from the agency so long after he receives notice of the allowance of his claim from the Pension Bureau.

If there was but one agency, by a consolidation here in Washington, and the certificates and vouchers were issued from the Bureau they would go promptly to the pensioners instead of being delayed in the agencies. This would save the expense and delay of double recording, and at the same time the pensioners would get their first payment sooner than they do now.

And if the widows' pension bill becomes a law, as it certainly will, this "enormous amount of work" will at once be doubled under the existing plan of paying pensions. This bill, as it has passed the Senate, increases the pensions of 181,863 widows of soldiers and sailors of the civil war, 6,800 widows of soldiers of the Mexican war, and 3,081 widows of soldiers of the Indian wars from $8 to $12 per month, and will place about 38,000 widows of soldiers and sailors of the civil war on the rolls at $12 per month in cases not now allowed. This bill will call for an annual increase of $15,398,112.

The death rate of pensioners is now about 4,000 per month. In substantially all these cases there is an accrued pension to be adjusted through the Pension Bureau, and then the result where widows and minor children are involved has to be sent to the agencies for payment, and this now produces delay, confusion, double work, and much correspondence, which would be saved, mainly, if all payments were made from the Pension Bureau as proposed.

It is but fair to say for Commissioner Warner that on his own personal account he would not desire the consolidation of the agencies in the Pension Bureau, as it would greatly augment his own personal labors and responsibilities, but as a business proposition he thinks it is his duty to advocate the abolition of the agencies.

The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Garfield, and the Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Warner, each expressed the belief that there would be a large saving in the cost of paying pensions; that they could all be paid from the Pension building; that in many instances the payment of pensioners would be materially facilitated; that there would be no necessity of a duplication of the records, as is now required, and that there would be a great saving in the matter of making settlements with the several agencies. I quote from the hearing before the subcommittee:

Mr. BOWERS. You have not suggested, Mr. Commissioner, just exactly how much, in case this consolidation goes into effect, this estimate for clerk hire, and so forth, can be safely cut out.

Commissioner WARNER. I think it would be safe to cut it $100,000. I think possibly it could be cut much more, but that is safe.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GARDNER. Will you have plenty of room in the Pension building?

Commissioner WARNER. Thank you for that suggestion. We will have room in the event that we are allowed the entire Pension building for pension purposes—that is, if they surrender us the whole building. We have the board of appeals in there now, of the Secretary's office, and one room is occupied by the Indian Office. If those rooms were restored to us, we would have plenty of room.

Mr. KEIFER. That could be done without any legislation.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes; I think the Secretary would do that.

Mr. KEIFER. I notice that there has been some effort made to secure part of that building for the purpose of storing away old patent models. Do you think that they ought to be there?

Commissioner WARNER. I do not want them in there, but if the Secretary wants them, then I do. Anything he wants I am for.

Mr. GARDNER. Your thought is that everything strictly connected with the operation of the Pension Bureau should be put under one roof?

Commissioner WARNER. All under one roof.

Mr. GARDNER. So that the Bureau would have ready access to all of the papers in case questions arise.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes. It will be a great convenience to have all of the pensions paid from that building. In case we want to know anything about a change of residence of a man who has been paid from a San Francisco agency, or any change regarding his condition whatever, we would be able to get that information at once. As it is now we have to write a letter and wait for the reply, for we must first communicate with San Francisco. We would be able, in the event of the consolidation, to get any information in regard to any of these cases within a few minutes, no matter whether it related to a pensioner on the Pacific coast, in Iowa, or anywhere else.

* * * * * * *

Commissioner WARNER. I would like to say that there is not a more pleasant or a more healthful office building in the United States for clerical work than the Pension Building here in Washington. Every room has an outside exposure, we have large corridors inside, with a very large court, making substantially two outside exposures. It is the healthiest and pleasantest office for clerical work that I know of.

Mr. GARDNER. Your judgment is that this consolidation would be ideal for handling the whole pension business, for the adjustment of pensions, the concentration of the correspondence, and everything connected with them? You believe that putting it all in that building is the best possible arrangement?

Commissioner WARNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARDNER. You could not suggest anything more perfect for the operation of the whole pension machinery?

Commissioner WARNER. No; it would all be in a nutshell instead of being scattered all over the United States as it is now, with eighteen different agencies. The pensions would all be paid from here the same as the interest on the public debt.

Mr. BOWERS. And would there not be some saving in the matter of duplication of records? As it is now a record has to be kept in both the central Pension Office and in the branch offices.

Commissioner WARNER. A great saving; yes. As it is now, the certificate is recorded here, then it is sent out to the pension agency and it is recorded there, and there is considerable duplication all the way through. Under the consolidation arrangement we would have it all in one office, and that would be the end of it. It would save clerk hire, time, and labor. If this were a private business, no business man would hesitate ten seconds in coming to a decision as to what he would do. He would consolidate it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KEIFER. Are all naval pensions paid from here, from the Washington office?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Washington agency pays the District of Columbia, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, West Virginia, and all pensioners residing in foreign countries. In addition to that it pays the naval pensioners from the Knoxville district, which comprises all of the Southern States as far west as Texas. Naval pensions are also paid by the Chicago, San Francisco, Boston, New York, and Philadelphia offices.

Mr. KEIFER. But the other pension agencies do not pay naval pensions?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Secretary GARFIELD. As a general proposition it seems to me that it would be wise administration to consolidate these agencies into one agency here at Washington. The reasons that lead me to reach this conclusion in brief are: That by the concentration and centralization of the handling of this work here in Washington, with the present organization in the Pension Office, and with the possibility of the introduction, as we could then, of certain mechanical devices for the handling of these hundreds of thousands of vouchers and certificates, we could, without interfering at all with the expedition with which the pensioners receive their claims, transact all of that business here and mail the checks to the various parts of the country, receiving the vouchers quite as quickly as it is now done under separate agencies. The laws as they now stand have done away, of course, with much of the difficulty in the general administration of the settling of claims and passing upon claims. The office is nearer up-to-date than it ever has been before in the history of this work. The pension appeals are absolutely current, they being passed upon almost immediately. The transaction of business within the office is of such a character that the Commissioner has been able, as he has doubtless told you, to reduce the force in accordance with the requirements of the appropriation bill, and he looks forward to a still further reduction of force.

The saving, as we figure it, will be something over $200,000, and I believe it will be even more than that when we put into effect all of the systematized business methods that can be put into effect if this work is brought here. I believe that the saving would be nearer $350,000 a year, in administration, and without any loss to the pensioners in expeditiously receiving their pensions, and without in any way interfering with the handling of the present business in the settlement of claims presented. Of course the great saving will be immediately in the salaries, but in the cost of maintaining the different agencies there will be likewise a very large saving. The Commissioner has found that there are differences in method obtaining in some of the agencies.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GARDNER. The feeling obtaining among the veterans is that this consolidation would delay their receiving their pensions. What have you to say as to that?

Secretary GARFIELD. From all information that we have been able to get, I believe that would not be true. I think we could quite as expeditiously handle them as they are handled at present.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GARDNER. That would lead to unification of administration.

Secretary GARFIELD. To unification of administration and harmony of administration, and it would do away with what at present is, I believe, a serious duplication of clerical work. I think it is unnecessary to do a great deal of the clerical work that is done now in the reporting of the agencies to the central office here and the handling of all that work over again. I think it would be a plan by which much of that duplication could be done away with.

Mr. GARDNER. What would be the effect of the consolidation in this way: Upon the duplication of work, and hence simplification and reduction of expense?

Secretary GARFIELD. It would be a very great gain in simplification and avoid a great deal of duplication.

Mr. GARDNER. And consequently it would reduce the current expenses of conducting the Office?

Secretary GARFIELD. And necessarily there would be greater economy. Every time we can avoid duplication, every time we can simplify, every time we can get greater efficiency we necessarily get greater economy.

Mr. GARDNER. You spoke of some mechanical devices. Have you any of those for the expedition of work in any of the present agencies?

Secretary GARFIELD. Some of the agencies have them already.

Mr. GARDNER. For example?

Secretary GARFIELD. The addressograph is one, and the adding machine is another. Those are all matters that save a great deal of clerical labor. If we retain all of the agencies, and introduce these machines into each agency, it would make a much larger expense of course; whereas, if the agencies are all brought here, one machine can handle a very large amount of the work instead of different machines scattered about through the different agencies. Wherever those mechanical devices have been installed—I do not recollect the number of agencies now using them—but they have added efficiency and expedition to the offices.

Mr. GARDNER. And do you think there would be a reduction in the per capita expense?

Secretary GARFIELD. The greater number of people supplied from one office the cheaper per capita. The machines can address 100,000 at the same expense as that of addressing 10,000 in the old way.

Mr. GARDNER. Am I correct in the understanding that in the smallest agencies you have to have the same machines, the same set of books, the same duplications that you have now in the larger agencies?

Secretary GARFIELD. That is true.

Mr. GARDNER. And therefore there is a much greater proportion of clerical hire for a small agency, as to the number paid, than in the larger agencies.

Secretary GARFIELD. Yes, measured by the number of pensions.

* * * * * * *

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to make a statement about the lost vouchers. That refers to the vouchers lost in the mails after they have been paid, and in transmission from the pension agency to the central government here. They get lost in the mails, and then it is very difficult to get a new voucher from the pensioner. Before the pension agent can get credit for the payment he must secure a duplicate voucher from the pensioner.

Commissioner WARNER. That would be all done here, right in the city, and there would be no danger of losing the voucher.

Mr. BOWERS. Under the present system the vouchers go to the pension agency, and after having been paid by the agent they are forwarded to Washington.

Secretary GARFIELD. Yes.

Mr. BOWERS. That involves two passages through the mails, while if they came here direct there would be only one passage through the mail, one trip for the voucher, and the risk of loss would be reduced?

Secretary GARFIELD. Without doubt, yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I'ermit me to say that if the pensioner's voucher is lost before it reaches the agency, a duplicate voucher is sent him right away, and there is no loss whatever.

Mr. KEIFER. He could not get paid until he got the duplicate?

Commissioner WARNER. When we have received that voucher, we would send the voucher right over to the Treasury, and it would be settled.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Would a loss of that character be a personal loss of the agent?

Secretary GARFIELD. We can not settle accounts until it is straightened out. This would reduce our letters very largely to the Treasury Department. Instead of having eighteen settlements, we would have one settlement.

Mr. KEIFER. Can you see, Mr. Secretary, that there would be a loss of time in the matter of paying some portion of the pensioners on account of the distance from Washington, and would not that only apply to the initial payment? It would postpone the day of receipt of the pension beyond the regular pension day once, and after that he would get it the same time?

Secretary GARFIELD. Exactly the same. There would not be any difference in the interval between payments. It would be the first payment only that would be affected by that.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GARDNER. What is the method of distributing vouchers and pension checks under the present conditions?

Mr. THOMPSON. At present all vouchers are printed for each of the agencies by the Government Printing Office. The checks are printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and these vouchers must be mailed from the Bureau of Pensions to the eighteen different agencies. The checks are sent direct from the Treasury.

Mr. GARDNER. And the vouchers are sent by the Bureau, so that there is a double sending?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. These vouchers and checks are printed up in different denominations for each agency; for instance, we print so many vouchers for each agent at $18, $20, $30, and so on up to the highest rate of pensioner. That duplicates the number required for each agency, making from forty to fifty different forms of vouchers and checks required by each agency.

Mr. GARDNER. What would be the advantage under the consolidation in this respect, if any?

Mr. THOMPSON. It would reduce this operation just seventeen times. In printing we would print in larger quantities. Instead of printing 1,000 of one form for each agency, we would print 10,000 for one agency.

Mr. GARDNER. And then send them directly from here to the individual pensioners.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; the vouchers would be sent direct to each pensioner from Washington.

Originally under an act of Congress (August 4, 1790) invalid pensioners were paid by the Commissioners of Loans. Some other pensioners were paid direct by the Treasury Department, and still others by the Paymaster-General of the United States Army, without any separate establishment being maintained to pay pensions. Later pension agencies were provided for. Formerly there was no system of paying, as now, by checks, for want of banks to cash them. The law (R. S. U. S., sec. 4780) passed February 5, 1867, and still in force, authorized the President to establish agencies for the payment of pensions whenever in his judgment the public interests and the convenience of the pensioners required.

If we appropriate for but one pension agent, the President will have to disestablish all the present agencies save one. The Commissioner, in the hearings (p. 8) submitted a plan for the consolidation of the agencies into one agency, a portion of which I quote:

> The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and directed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to arrange the pensioners, for the payment of pensions, in three groups, as he may think proper; and may from time to time change any pensioner from one group to another as he may deem convenient for the transaction of the public business. The pensioners in the first group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on January 4, April 4, July 4, and October 4 of each year; the pensioners in the second group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on February 4, May 4, August 4, and November 4 of each year; and the pensioners in the third group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on March 4, June 4, September 4, and December 4 of each year. The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby fully authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to cause payments of pensions to be made for the fractional parts of quarters created by such change so as to properly adjust all payments as herein provided.

This is also made, with other provisions, part of the bill. By this plan it will be seen that about one-twelfth of the pensioners would be paid each month, while now each agency pays a different number, and at each agency there are eight months in the year when no payments are required to be made at all, and at most the clerks are engaged only in preparatory work, two of each of the three months constituting a quarterly payment period. The plan is to have one set of clerks, with one addressing machine and adding machine, do the work on each monthly payment, and thus comprise within each year the payment of all pensioners. It is believed, however, this method alone would not only result in largely reducing the clerks required and the consequent expense of maintaining them, but that it will promote their efficiency and secure regularity and promptness in paying pensioners.

Pensioners now receive their checks on an average of not less than ten days after pension day, however prompt the pensioners may be in forwarding their vouchers. It is the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions that if the pensioners were all paid from here with a largely reduced number of clerks from 50,000 to 60,000 of them could be sent their checks in one day after their vouchers are received; and as only 80,614 pensioners would be paid here each month, less than two days would be required to make each monthly payment. In this way the payment of pensions would be facilitated rather than retarded. The difference in the time required for the vouchers and checks to pass by mail would, in the first payment, measure the delay. In many cases that difference would be small and after the first payment from here would be at least as regular every three months as now. Pensioners are now paid in alphabetical order from each agency, and hence those far down the alphabet are not paid as promptly as others.

The expedition in the payment of pensioners is not the only consideration. Large expense and some delay in making payments result from agencies being away from the seat of Government. I quote on this point from a recent letter of the Commissioner of Pensions:

> All pension checks must now be printed in this city and forwarded through the mails to the various pension agencies throughout the country. All vouchers to be executed by the pensioners are printed here in this city by the Government Printing Office and are forwarded through the mails to the various pension agencies, to be prepared and forwarded to the pensioners. More than 100 different forms of vouchers are now required for the eighteen pension agencies. As an illustration: Fifty-four different forms of vouchers are now required for pensioners under the act of February 6, 1907, three forms for each different agent, one at the $12 rate, one at the $15 rate, and one at the $20 rate. If all pensioners were paid by one disbursing officer, only three forms of vouchers would be required under this act instead of fifty-four. All certificates issued by the Bureau must first be forwarded to the pension agency, there to be reentered upon a different set of books and mailed to the pensioner from the agency. If all pensioners were paid from this city, the certificates would be issued by the Bureau and mailed to the pensioners upon the same date they are now mailed to the pension agency. The pensioners would therefore receive the new certificates much more promptly than they do now. All vouchers, after being paid by the pension agent, must be again mailed to this city, to the Treasury Department, where the accounts are audited. This Bureau can not furnish the latest post-office address of a pensioner or state when the pensioner was last paid without first securing a report from the pension agent upon whose rolls the pensioner's name is inscribed. If all pensioners were paid from this city, all such information would be immediately available, which would greatly assist in the prompt dispatch of the correspondence of this Bureau. All pension claims, as you are aware, are adjudicated here in this Bureau; and if all payments were made here, a complete history of each case would be readily available and the Bureau enabled to make prompt response to all inquiries.

It seems impossible to exhaust the many substantial reasons—economy and the pensioners' interests being kept steadily in view—in favor of a consolidation of the pension agencies.

The Topeka agent paid about one-ninth (111,508) and the Columbus agent about one-tenth (95,829) of the pensioners on the rolls in the fiscal year 1907, each paying month or quarter, while, if all had been paid from Washington, one-twelfth (80,614) would have been paid each month in the year. It follows that one set of paying clerks and a less number of clerks would be required at Washington than are now needed at either of these agencies to make the payments as promptly as they are there now made.

No other agency now pays as much as one-twelfth of the pensioners, and one-half or more of the agencies pay less than one-twentieth of them, and each of two pays less than one-fiftieth of them, while the average of all pensions paid at all the agencies is one-eighteenth. Unless each of sixteen of the agencies employs a relatively larger number of clerks than the two large pension agencies, or than would be necessary at Washington after the consolidation, they fail to pay the pensioners within their respective districts as promptly as pensioners are now paid at the two named agencies or as they would be paid at one agency, and all their clerks have to be retained throughout the whole year, though no payments are required to be made eight of the twelve months of the year. And the salaries of the pension agent and his chief clerk and the cost of an addressing and of adding machine outfits at each agency is still to be added.

It seems reasonable to conclude that the Secretary's and Commissioner's estimate of a reduction of the now average cost each year of paying each pensioner from 55 cents to 35 cents will, if the change is made, be more than realized, and that the maximum estimate of the annual reduction made by the Secretary of the Interior of $350,000 will at least result. Should this prove to be the case, the saving would be sufficient to pay 2,340 soldiers, sailors, or their widows each a pension of $12 per month, or that much increase on the pensions they are now drawing under existing law. If there is a reason for great liberality in disbursing the public moneys, there is more justice in giving it to those who bore the heat and burden of campaigns and battles, and to the dependent widows of those who are dead, than there is in unnecessarily keeping up local pension agencies.

The demands on the Republic for payment of pensions alone are too great to warrant any extravagance or liberality in the cost of paying them. And the maintaining of useless and expensive agencies for disbursing pension money merely because local parties will be benefited, or because worthy people will be thrown out of employment if they should be dispensed with, is not warranted either on the ground of necessity or on the ground of justice to the places of their location. If agencies should be maintained, because of local interests, where they are now located, then their number should be very largely increased in the interest of other equally necessitous and worthy localities.

Why should not all great cities, with their vast numbers of pensioners residing therein and in their vicinages, be given pension agencies? The cities of Baltimore, Cleveland, Cincinnati, St. Louis, New Orleans, Kansas City, Denver, St. Paul and Minneapolis, Omaha, Los Angeles, Portland (Oreg.), Seattle, and other large cities, in some of which and in their immediate vicinity reside more pensioners than reside in some agency districts, are now and have always been without a pension agency, and pensioners of some of these places and many others in the States and Territories receive, uncomplainingly, their pension checks from agencies located outside of their States more than a thousand miles away. Thirty-one of the forty-six States of the Union and all the Territories, Arizona, New Mexico, and so forth, have no pension agency located therein. From Knoxville the Army pensioners of ten States are paid, and other agencies pay pensioners of several States and Territories. The San Francisco agency pays the pensioners of eight States and three Territories and of the Philippines. The States and Territories of this agency are divided by the Rocky Mountains range, and are vast distances apart and from San Francisco. And the San Francisco agency pays the pensioners as regularly and promptly in the States of Idaho and Montana and in the Territories of New Mexico and Hawaii as it pays those residing in the Pacific coast States or in San Francisco. Remoteness from the paying agency is not a material factor.

And there is no rule of equitable division of work at the agencies. New York and Pennsylvania have each two pension agencies located therein. The two New York agencies disbursed in the last fiscal year $867,408.87 less than the Columbus, Ohio, agency, and $2,640,249.39 less than the Topeka, Kans., agency, and the two Pennsylvania agencies disbursed in the same year $693,090.78 less than the Columbus agency and $1,865,931.30 less than the Topeka agency. Greater disparities with other agencies appear by the figures. If the equitable distribution of the public funds alone is sought, it will best be accomplished in paying pensioners who reside in all parts of the United States.

Neither the revenues of the Government nor good economic business methods justifies the continuance of an expensive system of paying pensioners that is clearly now unnecessary and in no way beneficial to them.

I am well aware of the effort made by some interested persons, not pensioners, to persuade Members of Congress and the pensioners into the mistaken notion that in some way the payment of their pensions is to be delayed or that their pensions are in some mysterious manner to be affected to their injury if the agencies are consolidated. These persons have naturally met with but little success. Wherever the pensioner or old soldier is made acquainted with the facts relating to the matter he approves it. I would hesitate long before favoring any plan, even though business economy demanded it, that I believed would cause any real injury, or even serious delay in paying pensions, to any considerable number of pensioners. I have not heard a single objection to the consolidation of the agencies from my own State where there is located the next to the largest agency. The facts warrant the conclusion that no appreciable number of pensioners will be even delayed in the receipt of their pensions under the proposed plan; that there would be prompter payments made on original and increase pension certificates and on allowances of accrued pensions to widows and orphans, and that there would be at least $350,000 saved annually in the cost of paying pensions. I regret exceedingly that certain pension agents would be dispensed with under the consolidation plan, and that worthy clerks would, in some instances, lose their places. Some of them would doubtless be transferred to the Washington agency or to the Pension Bureau to continue the work they are now engaged on. There would necessarily have to be a gradual disestablishment of the agencies by the President.

Besides being constantly urged by petitions and otherwise to enlarge, by general laws, the pension roll and to increase its value, we are constantly appealed to by worthy claimants to pass special pension acts, and we are responding with reasonable liberality. Is there not great danger that the falling off of the revenues of the Government may force a withholding of further legislation in the matter of pensions, as well as in other important things, unless there is great retrenchment in the expenditures? And may we not endanger some of the veteran soldiers and their widows' rights by not following economical business principles in the payment of pensions?

The Committee on Appropriations, after full and careful consideration of the question, unanimously, as I remember, instructed me to report the bill as it is drawn, and I have given some of the reasons for its action.

I am sure the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions, collectively and individually, have kept the pensioners' interest and convenience steadily in view, with a desire to promote both, believing that this can be safely done and at the same time there may be a large saving in the matter of paying pensioners.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if the logic of the figures which he has quoted does not show that in this consolidation plan, which he has so ably presented, the combined agency should be located at Topeka, Kans., instead of at Washington?

Mr. KEIFER. I would say, in answer to that, I would agree with the gentleman if it were not for the War Department and the books and papers connected with the soldiers and sailors being located at this place. I want to add in answer that I am perfectly certain, having gone over this carefully, that we could transfer the agent at Topeka and a less number of clerks they have there and put them in the Pension Bureau here and discharge seventeen pension agents, including that one in Washington, with all the chief clerks and all the other clerks, and we could still pay all the pensioners with as much promptness and with as much regularity as they have been paid and are being paid now.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman recommend that that be done?

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to that being done, but I should prefer——

Mr. DALZELL. Then as an additional aid we will have a new bureau at Washington.

Mr. KEIFER. No new bureau at all. We are to have one Pension Bureau in Washington, just what we now have. We would not have one at Pittsburg or at sixteen other places.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate having expired, the Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, pensions, for services rendered within the fiscal year 1909, $500,000. And hereafter each member of each examining board shall receive the sum of $3 for the examination of each applicant whenever five or a less number shall be examined on any one day and $1 for the examination of each additional applicant on such day: Provided, That if twenty or more applicants appear on one day no fewer than twenty shall, if practicable, be examined on said day, and that if fewer examinations be then made, twenty or more having appeared, then there shall be paid for the first examinations made on the next examination day the fee of $1 only until twenty examinations shall have been made, and the fee shall be $3 when the examination is made by one surgeon, and the fee for each examination at the claimant's residence, provided his residence is outside of the corporate limits of the place of the regular meeting of the examining board, shall be $5 in addition to the payment of the actual traveling expenses of the surgeon: Provided further, That no fee shall be paid to any member of an examining board unless personally present and assisting in the examination of applicant: And provided further, That the report of such examining surgeons shall specifically state the rating which, in their judgment, the applicant is entitled to, and the report of such examining surgeons shall specifically and accurately set forth the physical condition of the applicant, each and every existing disability being fully and carefully described. The reports of the special examiners of the Bureau of Pensions shall be open to inspection and copy by the applicant or his attorney, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: And provided further, That hereafter no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in securing the introduction of a bill or the passage thereof through Congress granting pension or increase of pension, and any person who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain any compensation for such services shall be deemed guilty of an offense and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, on line 23, page 2, after the word "board," I move to amend by inserting the words "or of the place of residence of the surgeon directed to make the examination."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "board," in line 23, "or of the place of residence of the surgeon making the examination."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. WANGER. To what does the gentleman from New York reserve his point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To the gentleman's amendment. What does the gentleman suppose?

Mr. WANGER. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order does not lie to this amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a different question.

Mr. WANGER. I understand the gentleman reserves his point of order for the present, and I will direct myself to the proposition, as I understand it, that under the provision reported by the committee a surgeon's fee shall be $3 ordinarily, and $3 where he makes the examination within the corporate limits of the place of meeting of the board, but where the examination is at some other place the fee shall be $5.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me, the expectation is that each examination will be made when the examining surgeons are attending the place of meeting of their board, and if they do not have to go outside of the corporate limits, but if they had to go to some other place they would be paid something in addition.

Mr. WANGER. But these examinations at the place of residence are invariably, as far as my observation goes, made by a single surgeon. Now, why fix the fee at $3 if a local surgeon makes it within the corporate limits of the town where the board meets, but at $5 if the surgeon making it happens to make it within the corporate limits of the town where the latter surgeon resides, even though it is not within the corporate limits of the place of meeting of the board? Why shall the local member of the board of surgeons be paid only $3 for making his examination at the pensioner's residence and the other members of the board be paid $5 if they happen to make an examination within the corporate limits of their own town when the same is not the meeting place of the board?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not objecting to the amendment for my part. I think maybe it is proper.

Mr. WANGER. It is in line with economy and uniformity of compensation.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to suggest to him that his object will be better accomplished if he makes his amendment read "and of the place of residence of the surgeon making the examination," instead of "or of the place of residence of the surgeon making the examination?"

Mr. WANGER. I do not think it would be quite as well, because it would not usually apply to both places. Examination would be made in one place, and that place is as often as not where a member of the board lives, but in which the board does not meet. Ordinarily these boards are constituted of three surgeons, each of whom resides in a different town, and only one of them in the town where the board meets. Now, each of the other members of the board is just as capable of making an examination in his own particular town, and can make it therein with as little inconvenience as the other member can do it in the town of the latter.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Have they not got to meet as a board?

Mr. WANGER. Not as a rule. When these examinations are made at the residence of a soldier usually only a single surgeon conducts the examination.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not the gentleman mistaken in the proposition of the surgeons living in different towns? Instead of living in different towns, the practice of the Department is, as I understand, to appoint surgeons who live in the same town where the board meets.

Mr. WANGER. That is not the practice so far as it relates to the districts of which I have any knowledge.

Mr. NORRIS. I have just received a letter asking me to recommend a man for appointment on one of these boards, and I am specifically asked to recommend a man who lives in the town where the board meets.

Mr. WANGER. That is the usual request, but it is not a rule of action that is pursued.

Mr. PAYNE. In my district no two examining surgeons live in the same town.

Mr. WANGER. That is my knowledge.

Mr. NORRIS. The facts are, if the gentleman will permit me to say, I have found in my experience that you can not get surgeons to serve unless they are living in the same town where the examining board meets, because there is not sufficient business for them to close up their offices and go to a distance to attend to people.

Mr. WANGER. Well, your experience is different from mine in that matter. Where two or more members of a board live in the same town the adoption of my amendment will do no harm. It will leave the law in such instances just as proposed by the committee, and remove the discrimination as to other places of residence of surgeons.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist upon the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of one agent for the payment of pensions, $4,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "for salary of one agent for the payment of pensions, $4,000" and insert the words "for salaries of eighteen agents for the payment of pensions, $72,000."

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague, who has charge of this bill, mentioned before closing his remarks that he had not up to this time heard one objection made to this provision of the bill. I think it no more than proper that the first real objection to the bill as reported should come from a citizen of Ohio. I have not been so favored as my colleague in the matter of not hearing complaints, because I have not been enabled to step out of the Union Station in the city of Columbus before individuals, business men and clerks, and numerous citizens of all classes, down to the ranks of the old soldiers, made objection, to the effect that they do not desire to see all the Government Departments taken down to Washington and their city deprived of its fair proportion.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have you ever heard any objection from the pension agent at Columbus?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The pension agent at Columbus, General Warnock, I am glad to say, is a gentleman who was able to keep silent when this proposition of taking away his position was being discussed.

Now I shall devote myself entirely to the discussion of the point which I have raised.

The report which accompanies the bill very frankly discloses the intent of the committee to abolish the various pension agencies now situated in various parts of the United States, and to consolidate them all into one office in this city. The bill is very adroitly drawn, so that it does not mention such intent, for the purpose, I believe, of trying to get around the point of order which might very properly have been made against the bill had it contained a section expressly providing for such consolidation.

In the next place, Mr. Chairman, even if this bill does pass, its provisions will be, or at least can be, absolutely nullified at the will of the President under authority conferred by section 4780, which reads—

The President is authorized to establish agencies for the payment of pensions whenever in his judgment the public interests and the convenience of the pensioners require.

Provided not more than three agencies shall be established in one State, and provided no new agency shall be established in a State in which the whole amount of pensions paid the next preceding year was less than $500,000.

This law is now in full force and effect, and there is no attempt made to repeal it by this pending bill, or by any other bill, so far as I am advised. Under this law there have been established eighteen legal agencies. The bill as reported by the committee is nothing less than an attempt to legislate out of office seventeen of the eighteen agents who have been legally appointed by the President under the law which I have just read, by omitting any appropriation for them or making any provision whereby their salaries are to be paid. Inasmuch as these eighteen pension agents are now holding office by virtue of an existing law, which will be in full force and effect after the passage of this bill, it can readily be seen that the logical effect of the passage of this bill will be the transfer to Washington of the records, office force, and work of the various agents, leaving these legally appointed pension agents with nothing to do but collect their salaries to such time as their offices are abolished, for which they would have a valid claim against the Government.

Mr. DALZELL. They could go into the Court of Claims.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They could go and make a legal claim. The mere refusal to appropriate for a legal claim does not prevent its being collected. I have a case of a Federal judge in my district who has been in office for a year without receiving a cent of pay, not being confirmed; but as soon as ever he is confirmed he will have a legal claim for his salary.

Mr. KEIFER. I agree with you that the President established these agencies under the statute; may he not under the same statute disestablish them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. May he not under the same statute refuse to disestablish them? What right have you to claim that the President is going to disestablish them?

Mr. KEIFER. That his Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Pensions desire to disestablish them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I find nothing in the record here that shows that the President is going to follow their desire.

Mr. KEIFER. His own desire.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I have no record and have no knowledge obtained from this report which shows that it is his desire to disestablish these agencies created under this statute.

Now, coming to the point that there is going to be a great saving, the figures in the report of these gentlemen vary from $170,000 to $350,000 estimated savings. No facts are given, but just glittering and specious generalities. The few facts we have had were presented by the distinguished gentleman to-day.

Now, what have we before us as a matter of fact? The only reduction in this bill is $100,000 for clerk hire, $68,000 for the salaries of seventeen pension agents, and an increase of $10,000 for removing the records and clerks to Washington, which makes an absolute total reduction of only $158,000, and about $68,000 of that is in doubt, because the pension agents are still holding their offices and will continue to do so until their offices are abolished. Now, we can talk about $350,000, and we can take all the big figures we want. As a matter of fact, you are saving the puny sum of $158,000, and you are doing it by discharging competent and meritorious people from their employment, to a large extent.

The Commissioner states that he has no intention of discharging anybody; that he is going to remove all the clerks to Washington. Now, we all know that every clerk in a like position in an inland city receives less money proportionately than a clerk in the same position in Washington. For instance, a $1,000 clerk in Columbus or San Francisco or Pittsburg does the same work as a $1,200 or $1,300 or $1,400 clerk in Washington. We know this from the reports of the Keep Commission. The Keep Commission recently made a report in which they find that it costs not less than 20 per cent more to live in Washington than it does in other cities, by reason of high rents and extremely high prices of living. What are we going to do if we bring a lot of thousand dollar clerks down here but raise their salaries, to treat them fairly at all? Will not that do away with a large part of the saving?

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact also that many of these clerks have their little homes in the places where they are now living and are bringing up their families there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I was coming to that.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman permit me right there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WANGER. The inquiry which I wish to make is right on the line of what the gentleman is saying. It has been said that if the 432 clerks now in the various pension agencies of the country should receive the same average salaries as are paid to the clerks in the Bureau of Pensions, it would cost the Government for clerk hire $125,425.60 more than it does now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is exactly correct. I was about to state that at least $100,000 would be the necessary increase to give them an equally fair salary as other clerks are paid in Washington.

Now, here is another hardship to be worked on these employees in Washington. Take it in the city of my birth, where we have one hundred or more clerks in the pension office, the next to the largest agency in the country, disbursing over $14,000,000 a year to soldiers living in Ohio alone. These people have been there for years. They have become citizens, most of them were born there, they have their houses there, they have paid for them, and they will have to give them up and come to a strange city, where, if they should be discharged, as they must be to meet this $100,000 saving, they would be thrown upon their own resources, where there is no commercial or other opening for anybody.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman also taken further into consideration the fact that there would be sent through the post-office at Washington perhaps 10,000,000 additional letters a year, at a vastly increased expense to the post-office here, which letters are now sent through the eighteen different offices, without any additional expense; or, in other words, that the cost of those offices would not be at all lessened in order to meet the increased cost in the Washington post-office?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is true.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Did I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that there are 100 clerks employed in these agencies?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I said there were a large number. I have not the exact number.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. As a matter of fact there are exactly thirty-six.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is all right; I am not prepared to deny or affirm these things.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will read to the gentleman from the official report.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Oh, no; I will take the gentleman's word.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I knew that the gentleman from Ohio did not wish to go on record that there were 100 clerks in these offices if he were in error.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, these people are citizens, residents of the cities in which they live, not temporary residents as are the great body of clerks in Washington. The committee's claim for justification of this provision is on the ground of economy; they are going to save $158,000 if this bill goes through. I would like to say that if the House abolishes all branches of the Government that does not earn its expenses, let us turn our eyes to some other things. How about the custom-houses, how about the consulates, how about the rural free-delivery routes? Do any of these things pay? No; but would the House dare to abolish such splendid institutions, established as they are for the necessary convenience of the people? These are honest and intelligent people, and they have a right to this expenditure; the old soldiers are entitled to it. This means no saving, as has been claimed for the cost of the so-called "labor-saving machines" and new salaries will more than make up any saving. History has never recorded the fact that the governmental Departments in Washington are run so much more economically than the departments which have existed in other cities. An investigation of the statistics will show the opposite to be the fact.

At this time, when Congress is asked to appropriate millions for the increase of the Navy and the maintenance of the Army and for public buildings and internal improvements, I do not think we are called upon to treat either the Government clerks who will be affected by this provision in the bill or the old soldiers who are the wards of this Government so unjustly, and I sincerely hope the House will defeat this plan of consolidation proposed by the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if this were an original proposition, I question whether I could support the recommendations of the committee in view of the showing, or lack of showing, that is made in the report of the Secretary of the Interior and in that of the Pension Commissioner. Last year when we passed a compromise measure, calling on the Secretary of the Interior to make an inquiry as to the economy that would result in case these agencies were consolidated we had the right at least to assume that some such inquiry would be made that could be regarded with some respect, but in his report that he has submitted to the House not one syllable or line is found to show and support his contention that this would result in economical management.

The figures in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions show that the expense will not be minimized if the agencies are consolidated, but they will be increased. From the statement, as found on pages 30, 31, and 32 of the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, we find that the average expense per capita at the Washington agency is 63.13 cents. In the remaining thirteen agencies the expense is much less, in some instances aggregating 20 cents per capita.

I listened attentively to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], who has charge of the bill, but he failed to point out this discrepancy in the figures, which, when calculated on the number of pensioners and the diminished cost per capita at the respective agencies, amounts to more than $100,000 in expense if these agencies were to be consolidated here in Washington.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question? He stated a moment ago that the committee had reported in favor of this proposition without any apparent investigation or inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not the committee, but the Secretary of the Interior, on whom Congress called to make an inquiry.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the provision carried in the last pension appropriation bill wherein the Secretary of the Interior was to report upon that matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have that before me, and have read it very closely, and I am criticising that very report and calling the attention of the committee to the fact that he has made no inquiry at all; and we had the right to assume he would before he would make any such recommendation as he has in this document. This document involves nothing more than what the Pension Commissioner stated to the gentleman's committee a year ago, giving in an omnibus way information that there would be saved $100,000; but when we come to the facts as disclosed by his own tables, we find that the expense of manning the agency is greater here in Washington than in other cities. When the query was put to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], he failed to explain why the average salary for clerks in the agency in Washington is $1,200 and more and in the local agencies the average expense is a little above $900.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. As I take it, the gentleman thinks that the abolishment of these offices would increase the expense?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do, based upon the fact that the clerks in Washingon receive about $300 more than what is paid to the clerks in the respective agencies around the country.

Mr. NORRIS. And that these clerks, when brought to Washington, would have to be paid an increase of salary?

Mr. STAFFORD. It follows, as a matter of course, that they will be paid an increased salary, because it is known to every person who has investigated the administrative arm of this Government that in Washington, because of the increased expense of living, the salaries of the clerks are higher, and the tendency is to level them to those of the higher class.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman explain, that being true that it is going to increase the salary of these clerks, why it is that all of these clerks in the different agencies are opposed to the abolishment of the different agencies and opposed to coming to Washington, where they can get an increase of salary?

Mr. STAFFORD. An increase of salary! It is only in name and not in fact, when they are obliged to pay more for living in Washington. What is the reason for the higher salaries in Washington? It is because the expense of living is greater.

But I oppose this more because I am opposed to the establishment of any bureaucracy, and if this work can be carried on as economically throughout the various cities of the country as now maintained, I believe that they should be continued. There is no showing made by the members of the committee that there has been a great decrease in the number of pensioners which will require discontinuance of any of these agencies.

In fact, if I remember the figures cited by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS], it is a fact that in 1906, only two years ago, the maximum amount of pensioners was added to the rolls, and but 36,000 on an average yearly are being discontinued. It would be far better from the showing made, better from a sociological standpoint, in having this work performed throughout the country where it is of convenience to the pensioners, giving employment to the clerks who are domiciled there, than by consolidating them and increasing the large clerical force here in Washington. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, unless they can show that some real economy will result, I believe that the present eighteen agencies should be continued, and until they can show that, until the Secretary of the Interior can make a proper showing that there will be some real saving rather than indulging in some general omnibus claim that $100,000 will be saved, when their own figures show that the clerical work would cost much more, I think these agencies should be maintained.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that a similar measure passed this House by a very large vote, possibly last Congress, went to the Senate, and that a struggle occurred between the two Houses, the result being that the proposition was defeated. I think I correctly state the history of this matter. The judgment of this House was that this reform should be had. I voted for it, and I am going to vote for this. There are pension agents in my city. There are examining surgeons in my city. There are always, Mr. Chairman, very capable surgeons and agencies and people living in Tennessee and in Nashville. There is a large agency at Knoxville, Tenn., and the position at that agency has been held by both Democrats and Republicans. So that if we have, as possibly we will have, the Presidency the next time, some Democrat will get that place. But I am not looking at that.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, if he intends to vote in the interests of economy and for the convenience of the soldiers, why it would not be proper for him to vote to locate this single agency somewhere in the center of the United States, where it could be reached handily and be most convenient for the soldiers—say, at Topeka, Kans.?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I guess some storm will come along some day and sweep it to Kansas, and possibly another storm, one of indignation, will come along and sweep it back to where it ought to be.

Mr. REEDER. I would like to inquire why the gentleman says "where it ought to be," when Topeka is in the center of the nation and where the soldiers would have the advantage of having it located where it could be reached most readily by all concerned.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It may be the center of the country, but it is not the center for this agency, possibly.

Mr. REEDER. But more soldiers could reach it quickly, and besides it would be a saving of much expense.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. So far as I am concerned, I will say to my friend that I do not care where the agency is located. I am talking about the question of this reform.

Mr. REEDER. And I am asking why the gentleman will not vote for the place where it will be more cheaply managed and at the same time more convenient.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Because I have not reached the question of where it should be located. However, I think it ought to be here in Washington. We have the machinery here to run the whole business.

Mr. REEDER. We have the machinery in Topeka, we have the office and the clerks.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say you have as large a bureau as they have in Washington?

Mr. REEDER. We have plenty of help to carry on this work, provided the pensioners are paid each month, That is, one-third of the whole number each month of the year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that you have pension machinery now in Topeka enough to run the pension business of the United States?

Mr. REEDER. Provided the pensioners are divided into three divisions, and one division paid each month.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Divided into three divisions. Do you mean to say you have that kind of machinery there now?

Mr. REEDER. It could be very easily arranged to pay these pensioners there, and it can be done much more economically there than in Washington.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If what you are stating is actual fact, and I will not dispute it, do you mean to say, then, that Topeka has enough machinery to run this Pension Bureau? Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is a fact, and that is the substance of what the gentleman has said, then, Mr. Chairman, the greater the reason why we should bring about this reform, because you have too many offices in Topeka for the business, you have too many in Knoxville for the business, you have too many in Washington for the business, and you are duplicating the work, you are duplicating the records, you are duplicating the salaries, and the Government of the United States is not getting a quid pro quo——

Mr. STAFFORD. They ought to get that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, here is what Secretary James Rudolph Garfield says:

> Under the practice now in vogue there is a duplication of records.

Which goes to corroborate what the gentleman from Kansas has just stated. He says he has enough machinery there, if the pensioners were divided in three parts, to run the whole business.

Mr. REEDER. I would like to quote the gentleman in charge of the bill, General KEIFER, as authority that the machinery at Topeka could be easily arranged to pay all the pensions if they are paid one-third each month of the year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; no, indeed.

Mr. REEDER. I said it could be easily arranged by making a division of the pensioners into three divisions and having one-third of the soldiers paid each month of the year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to get it fairly; does the gentleman mean to say that he has now in the Topeka office enough machinery to run the Pension Bureau of the United States?

Mr. REEDER. No, sir; but I do say, and I insist on it, that it can be done to much better advantage to the soldiers and a good deal cheaper with little addition to the force at Topeka, and why not do it there if both cheaper and more convenient?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask for five minutes additional time. My time has been taken up by interruptions and I want to help this reform along.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I desire to accentuate the proposition of the gentleman, and Mr. Garfield says that under the practice in vogue there is a duplication of records. Now, then, he says another thing—that all the printing is done here in Washington and then has to be sent all over the United States, of course either by the mails or by the express trust, all at the expense of the Government of the United States. Why send it all over the United States? Why not have this great Bureau down here do all the work? Why, Mr. Chairman, are all the Members of the House and Senate given notice that a pension has been had in favor of John Jones, and then a Member must take that notice and send it to John Jones in Kansas or Tennessee? Why not have it, as I think it should be, at one place? Have one set of officers, keep this great hauling of printing from being sent through the mails or by express. Why continue a system of clerks and officers to keep duplicating records?

Why not have the reform, as Mr. Garfield says we should have, of keeping here all of these valuable papers and these vouchers that have to be sent backward and forward? Why put them in the mail to be lost, as he says many are lost? He states here, furthermore—and I have had no particular chance to investigate this matter, but I am trying to help you gentleman along with your reform and save money and inconvenience to the Government—that the pensioners in the South are paid from the city of Washington. There are two or three thousand pension papers that have gone through my hands in the last eighteen months. There are one to five or six per day in my mail. My mail runs from 60 to 125 letters per day. Why write me and the pensioner and the outside offices? Why not one central agency to do it all? Garfield says, furthermore, that there are thousands of pensioners in California, and yet the California pension office does not wait on all the California pensioners, as there are other offices that do it. But, Mr. Chairman, I have not said what I have for the purpose of doing anything else than this: First, to show you that I stand for this needed reform and stood for it two years ago, and second, to impress upon you that you are duplicating this work and unnecessarily. Secretary Garfield says that you are duplicating the records, that the records in Tennessee are the same as the records in Washington City, and that there is need for but one set of records. We should cut off the duplication of the expense of printing the records, the duplication of clerks, and duplication of salaries. Gentlemen, why do you not cut down this expense and, if necessary, in a proper case increase the pension of the old hero, his widow, or his child? [Applause.] That is where I want the money to go. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], whom I so much respect both as a man and as a lawmaker, speaks for a continuation of this system. I say, discontinue it and take the money away from these little clerks or the big ones around over the country and turn it over to the widows and orphans of the heroes the gentleman honors and to whom he pays so much respect. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR]. I have in my hand a series of resolutions adopted by the Department of California and Nevada of the Grand Army of the Republic, in which the members of the Grand Army oppose the abolition of these offices.

Mr. Chairman, the pension office in San Francisco serves 43,000 pensioners. It takes but a day or two for the mail to go from San Francisco to any place on the mainland that is served from that office. Of course it also serves the pensioners in the Philippine Islands and in Hawaii and Alaska, but I apprehend that, after all, the number of pensioners in these outlying districts is comparatively few. The greater number of pensioners who are served from this office live in the State of California, and many of them in the city of San Francisco.

The point is made by them that by having the office in San Francisco they are enabled to go there and find out little details about their pension which it would be practically impossible for them to do if they had to enter into correspondence with a central bureau here. They say, too, that letters go astray, and in case a letter containing their checks or their vouchers were lost it would require probably three weeks before they could ultimately settle the matter of having another pension voucher or another check issued. It takes five days for a letter to travel from San Francisco to Washington. It takes five days for a letter to get back, and then it would take a number of days here to investigate and look into the matter. Now, to many gentlemen that may be a matter of no particular moment, but to an old soldier who is depending upon his pension, who has not much of this world's goods, who makes engagements to pay certain obligations at the time his pension falls due, it is certainly a serious matter if he can not get his money strictly on time. The committee speaks about the economy that this provision of theirs will bring about.

But it has been shown here that after all there will be practically no saving, for all of the clerks who will be transferred to Washington will have their salaries raised. Then, too, there is much merit in the point that was made so well by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON]. As he said, you will have to increase by a large number the clerks in the post-office here in order to handle this additional mail, whereas that mail is now handled effectively with the clerical force that is now at work in all of the different post-offices where these agencies exist.

In the eyes of the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the position of Commissioner of Pensions, and for whom I have the highest regard, it may be a trifling matter to ask the clerks to give up their homes, to break the ties that bind them to those places where they now reside—for they have their relatives and friends there—to come here to Washington to do this work. But those are all considerations that should be taken into account in the discussion of this matter.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the economy that is spoken of so much by my friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] should not be the only consideration in this matter. If it were we would have to alter many things in this Government. Take the large cities of this country. They all have central post-offices and stations and substations all over the city.

You might with equal justice abolish those stations, abolish those substations, and let everybody who wants to buy a postage stamp go to the central office for it. It can be done cheaper; money can be saved by doing it. But, after all, the Government renders its citizens a great service by establishing these convenient places for them, in order that they may transact their business expeditiously and without unnecessary loss of time. And so with the pension agencies. They are convenient for the old soldiers and for the widows of soldiers, and, in my judgment, they should not be abolished.

I desire to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may print as part of my remarks the resolutions from the Department of California and Nevada of the Grand Army of the Republic. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolutions are as follows:

During the last session of the Fifty-ninth Congress the conference committee of the Senate and House agreed to recommend the passage of the pending bill, as amended by the Senate, for the appropriation for pensions during the ensuing fiscal year only after the adoption of the following resolution, viz:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make inquiry and report to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session the effect of a reduction of the present pension agencies to one such agency, upon the economic execution of the pension laws, the prompt, efficient payment to pensioners, and the inconvenience to pensioners, if any, which would result from such reduction."

Whereas speaking for and in behalf of the 40,000 or more pensioners paid at the Pacific coast agency, we feel that the abolishment of this and the other pension agencies would result in much confusion; and

Whereas the revolutionizing of the present method of paying pensions to which the recipients have become accustomed, and that they, by reason of advancing age, infirmities, and increasing necessities, would prefer such methods to be continued; also, feeling that being in charge of a pension agent near them, where their correspondence meets with quick and sympathetic response, and considering the uncertainties of mail deliveries on the Pacific slope, which would be greatly increased by the greater distance from place of mailing; and

Whereas many veterans, widows, and dependents have contracted to meet obligations on or about the day when their quarterly pension becomes due, and that failure to meet such obligations on the promised date would involve them in much embarrassment and inconvenience; and

Whereas we fully believe that from an economic point of view the saving to the Treasury would be small, as it would affect only the salary of the seventeen pension agents, all veterans of the civil and Spanish wars, under heavy bonds, doing much work in the positions now held by them; the amount so saved would be greatly exceeded by the necessary expense of closing the agencies, removing their records, and fitting up suitable quarters where pension payments to a million pensioners must be continued by a clerical force fully as large as needed at the present time, whose salaries, perhaps, would have to be increased by reason of the greater cost of living in the city of Washington: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of California and Nevada, in annual encampment assembled, That we deem it unwise and detrimental to the interest of the many thousands of pensioners to have the present system of pension agencies disturbed: And be it further

Resolved, That if the authorities in Washington should deem it necessary to reduce the number of agencies now existing, that the agency in San Francisco, now administering to 43,000 veterans and soldiers' widows, ought to be continued, as a change from the coast to Washington would work great hardship, inconvenience, and, with many, great suffering, as expressed in the preamble to these resolutions;

Resolved, That, on behalf of our veterans of this coast, we most emphatically oppose the transfer of our pension agency, and most respectfully express our decided conviction that neither the country nor the beneficiaries of the pension laws will be benefited by such change;

Resolved, That we earnestly and urgently implore the President and the Secretary of the Interior, in the interest of the veterans of the Pacific coast, to continue the agency in San Francisco for the benefit of our veterans who have become accustomed to look upon our pension agency as a home institution, which has administered the affairs of the office in such a prompt, efficient, and sympathetic manner that the beneficiaries have looked upon it as a blessing, the removal of which would cause untold confusion to them in their fast declining years;

Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be furnished to the Secretary of the Interior and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

[OFFICIAL SEAL.] WM. G. WATERS,
Department Commander.

JOHN H. ROBERTS,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I dislike ordinarily to disagree with my committee, particularly on a matter where a great reform is to be attempted in the public service. But the action of the committee in this matter will not accomplish what is proposed. The action of the committee will do nothing more than to bring hardship to the men who are entitled to the salaries that are to be withheld.

I wish to impress this on the committee. The President has the power to-day to discontinue these agencies; he has now the opportunity to demonstrate his sincerity as a great reformer. He will not discontinue these agencies, even if the salaries be withheld, because he needs the places to promote his pet political schemes. [Applause.] The "Rough Riders" from Ohio are in the saddle, and they can not spare any of the places. [Laughter.] Let me call your attention to the conditions that exist. The Secretary of the Interior, one of the "pink-tea" set [laughter], has the confidence of the President and access to him as no other man in this city. If he does not pass most of his time in the White House, he at least spends a large share either in the Cabinet room or the tennis grounds. Accessible in working hours and out of working hours. He stated in the committee that there were two of these pension agencies that had come to the point where the number of pensioners paid from them was below the number that was sufficient to make the conduct of the office economical. Two of them! One in the State of Maine and one in the State of New Hampshire.

Now, what a peculiar coincidence existed; just about the time the Secretary of the Interior was informing the Committee on Appropriations that it was not economical to maintain the New Hampshire agency a vacancy occurred in it. It was vacant. The President had the power to discontinue it or to refuse to appoint an agent for that district. What did he do? Well, he forgot that there were two Senators from the State of New Hampshire; he forgot that there was an able delegation in this House from the State of New Hampshire, one of them the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, evidently entitled to be consulted as to the man who should be the pension agent in his State. But realizing the importance of building up in the New England States the candidacy of his candidate for President he nominated a man who was recommended by the friends of Secretary Taft for the office. So offensive was that recommendation to the members of the delegation from New Hampshire, and so vicious a violation of all professions of the President in regard to the use of political patronage for political and personal ends, that even a Republican Senate revolted, and to protect the President they rejected the nomination.

Now, Mr. Chairman, of what use is it to talk about abolishing these agencies merely by withholding the salaries of the agents with the President seeking, as he is, on all sides and in all places, opportunities to corral delegates or to appoint men who will dominate conventions that select delegates who will be in harmony with the Administration, who will "play true, run right," do anything else, and vote for his candidate? He will not take notice of the obvious impropriety of filling this place, but grabs it! grabs it! grabs it! [Laughter.] Yes, "grabs!" [laughter] and ignores all of the delegation, Republicans, to add a prop to his heavy-weight candidate, who can not stand on his own feet. [Laughter.] Now, I am a reformer. [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that I have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that he was a reformer. I suppose he is in favor of the retention of these eighteen agencies; the rest of the reformers seem to be in favor of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am a reformer; a sincere reformer. [Laughter.] When I reform I want to accomplish something. I am not one of those bravado fellows who shouts a great deal with his mouth, but always takes the goods while everybody else is looking the other way. [Laughter.] If we are going to abolish these pension agencies, let us be frank about it. Let us put it in the law that there shall be but one pension agent, and his salary shall be $4,000, which is hereby appropriated. Do not let the President get away with the Grand Army on this and say, "Why, Congress was wrong; I had the power to abolish these agencies. If it is good, if it is proper, and even if I did not have the power, it would not make any difference if I thought it should be done. Why, I have now got the offices, and Congress, without full investigation, without proper information, has decreed that my appointees, the men that I need in the coming fight, are to be cut out of their rations, and, by the 'big stick,' I will not stand for it!" [Great laughter.]

Why, is it not true? He appointed a man named Fairbanks up there in New Hampshire. I was misled by that for a few minutes myself. I really thought he was a friend of the Vice-President. But these Taft chaps are pretty clever. They said, "We will take a 'Fairbanks' and get away with these other fellows before they wake up." Then when the Republican Senators heard about it they were righteously indignant. The President had been breaking into the Senatorial preserves so long and had taken so much from them that they said, "We must stand together, boys, or we will hang singly; let us reject this nomination." Then my information, which comes by that wireless, airless, noiseless system which the President uses himself, is that the latest appointment, a very fine gentleman, a brave soldier, if I am not misinformed, and a distinguished citizen of the State, has been nominated for that place, not after consultation with the Senators from New Hampshire, not after consultation with the members of the delegation, but upon the recommendation of the referee. They have referees in Northern States now, but they are all Taft men. They use them wherever it is possible that the friends of the Speaker of the House, or of the Vice-President of the United States, or of the Senator from Pennsylvania, or of some other distinguished and worthy Republican might corral the delegates who might not be with the President or his shadow. He says, "We will extend the referee system." And of course on that side they can not complain, because they have advocated it so long in its application to places on this side. I do not know but that it is a great extension of the civil service. I am with the President on it. I think he ought to name only his friends for office; and if there is anybody else in, I am willing he should take them out, because, Mr. Chairman, it would give me more pleasure about this time next year to help to cut off the heads of all Roosevelt men rather than to be taking off the heads of the friends of the Speaker and the Vice-President and all my other good friends on that side of the House.

Now, if we can not be honest in our reform, do not let us attempt to reform at all. Do not let the President again come in here and insist on being virtuous and retaining these agents. Do not let him weep tears for the old soldier while his confidential young man comes down and tries to work Congress on the quiet. Why didn't he tell all this to the President? Why did not that big man, that strong man, the President, do what they ask us to do? He can do it effectively. We are not trying to be effective. [Applause.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, and I rise for the purpose of supporting the report made by the committee on this proposition.

As was stated by the gentleman from Mississippi a while ago, so far as the pensions are concerned, the amount is at all times a mere matter of calculation. The Commissioner of Pensions knows substantially to a dollar what is going to be required to send out.

I have a great deal of feeling for the various clerks so eloquently spoken for by various Members, who reside at the different agencies throughout the United States. But above all, Mr. Chairman, I have more feeling and more sympathy for the soldier who actually earned the money that is due him and the money that this committee is now appropriating to pay him. I have in my own State, at the city of Indianapolis, an agency which distributes every year more than $10,000,000. More than 60,000 pensioners are paid through that agency every year. But, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions have said, and the report states, that by abolishing these pension agencies and concentrating them into one we will ultimately save to the United States at least $225,000 per year. For one, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of economy, but I am not in favor of economy as against the soldiers of this country. If this $225,000 that it now costs the people of the United States to maintain these agencies can be saved, and that amount of money appropriated to the soldiers of the United States, for one I am in favor of it. Now, as it has been said here, section 4780 of the Revised Statutes of the United States leaves it discretionary with the President of the United States as to how many agencies there shall be established in this country. That being solely a discretionary matter, I imagine, if this House refuses to appropriate money for more than one agency, the remainder of these agencies throughout the United States will naturally and necessarily cease.

Again, there was passed at the last Congress, on March 4, 1907, a recommendation requiring the Secretary of the Interior to examine into the economical side of this question as to whether or not it would save the people any money to consolidate these agencies into one. Their recommendations are reported by the Committee on Pensions, and they state that it will save at least $225,000 a year to adopt this policy.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care if it would save but $25,000 a year, I am in favor of it. I know the soldiers of my district, I believe, intimately, and I know without a single exception the Grand Army of the Republic in the district I represent are in favor of the abolition of the pension agencies and appropriating that money to pay the soldiers of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of economy in the administration of the affairs of the Government, but at the same time I am in favor of a liberal policy toward the soldiers, their orphans and widows, who have done so much for the perpetuation of this Republic of ours. Early in the session I introduced a bill which I hoped would become a law before the session closed. It provides that soldiers 63 years of age should receive a pension of $13 per month; those 64 years of age a pension of $14 per month; 65 years of age, $16 per month; 66 years of age, $17 per month; 68 years of age, $18 per month; 69 years of age, $19 per month; 70 years of age, $20 per month; 71 years of age, $22 per month; 72 years of age, $24 per month; 73 years of age, $26 per month; 74 years of age, $28 per month, and 75 years of age, $30 per month.

I had hoped to see this bill enacted into a law this session, but I fear it has gone the way of many other good bills which have been introduced this session of Congress tending to benefit the condition of the soldiers who now need the aid and support at the hands of a grateful Government so gallantly defended by them during the wars in which this country had been engaged, both at home and abroad. My bill is not really what I would like to see passed by this Congress, but I recognize that it is a difficult matter to give equal and exact justice to all persons now upon the pension roll; and, believing that my bill would at least tend to do some justice toward the deserving class of people; that it would ameliorate some of the present hard conditions concerning the soldiers, and with the confident hope that it would receive recognition at the hands of Congress, I so introduced it.

I would gladly vote for the Sherwood bill, which proposes to give every soldier who served eighteen months or more in the Army, $1 per day, or I would gladly vote for any bill that would give a soldier who served ninety days or more in the late civil war, and who was honorably discharged therefrom, $1 per day.

The McCumber bill, passed February 6, 1907, was a step in the right direction, but, in my judgment, it does not go far enough. Under this bill soldiers who have reached the age of 62 years are entitled to a pension of $12 per month; 70 years of age, $15 per month; and 75 years of age or over, $20 per month. The objection to this bill is, that the increase of pension is not in proportion to the decline of years of the soldier's life. It gives all soldiers 62 years of age $12 per month; then the soldier must wait eight years, or until he is 70 years of age, before he is entitled to participate in an increase, and then only at the rate of $3 per month. Then he must wait five years more, or until he is 75 years of age, before he is entitled to another increase, and then only $5 per month, making $20 the maximum pension that he can receive under this bill. It is a well-known fact that a man after he has passed the age of 65 is on a rapid decline, unable longer to physically fight the battles of life, and more especially, I think, true of the soldier who for days, weeks, months, and years exposes himself to the hardships of war.

To meet these conditions I have introduced my bill, so that while the soldier so rapidly traveling down the western horizon of life every month and every year, his earning capacity becoming less and less, his pension ought to be correspondingly increased every year to meet this ever changing physical condition. The time is now here when this question ought to be forever settled and settled right—settled as our soldiers have settled every question they ever undertook to settle from the days of the Revolutionary War down to the present hour. The total number of certificates issued under the McCumber bill on the 1st day of January, 1908, was 281,475, increasing the pension roll $15,018,000.

Short as this period is from February 6, 1907, of the number of soldiers who availed themselves of the benefits of the McCumber bill, 4,000 of them have since died, and the estimated death rate of the soldiers now drawing a pension under this bill is about 1,000 per month, showing a very rapid degree of mortality, and as the years roll on the death rate will be much more rapid, so that even if my bill was enacted into a law it would not add very materially to the annual appropriation of pensions because of the rapid death rate of the soldiers now going on. Even if it did add to the increased cost, it is a mere bagatelle, every dollar of which finds its way into circulation and keeps the soul and body together of some deserving soldier or a member of his family.

The total disbursement for pensions for all wars and for Regular establishment, the War of the Revolution, estimated $70,000,000. The war of 1812, on account of service without regard to disability, $45,625,899.24.

The Indian wars, on account of service without regard to disability, $39,397,733.57.

The war of the rebellion, $3,389,135,449.54.

The war with Spain, and increased in the Philippine Islands, $18,909,512.43. Regular establishment, $9,864,344.67.

Unclassified, $16,260,397.04. Total disbursements for pensions down to and including the fiscal year 1908, $3,598,015.69.

There is now living no soldier or soldier's widow of the Revolutionary War, and there is no pensioned soldier living of the war of 1812, but there are on the pension rolls 558 widows of the war of 1812. The last survivor of the War of the Revolution was Daniel F. Bakeman, who died in Freedom, in Cattaraugus County, N. Y., April 5, 1869, aged 109 years 6 months and 8 days, and the last surviving widow, Esther S. Damon, who died at Plymouth Union, Vt., November 11, 1906, aged 92 years. There are still three daughters of soldiers of that war on the pension rolls by special acts of Congress.

It will be but a few more years until the last roll will be called of all the survivors of the unfortunate, but great, war from 1861 to 1865. We can well afford, as one of the greatest nations upon the earth, to care for those who cared for us during that trying time. I hope to see my bill or some other good service-pension bill enacted into a law, if not at this session of Congress, then early in the next session. [Applause.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, we have here a phenomenal development of abnormal economy in the House. We have before us the question where 967,371 pensioners are paid from the Treasury of the Federal Government, and the payment and management of the Pension Bureau have reached that wonderful point where five Members of this Congress on the subcommittee of the Appropriation Committee have decided to take from them, without a hearing, without their consent or knowledge, the management of the whole matter. It is not only a step toward centralization, which is wrong in principle and in practice, but it is a great injustice to the soldiers of this Republic; and, besides that, it is not economy. This bill proposes to centralize in Washington, in the most expensive city in this nation, eighteen agencies where clerks do the least work at the largest salaries paid in the United States.

We paid off last year 114,164 soldiers outside of Washington at an average of 7 cents and 4 mills higher than is paid in the city of Washington. We made a saving of $844.81. Last year we paid 794,569 soldiers at 7 cents cheaper than the agency paid them off in the city of Washington, making a saving by paying them off outside of Washington of $55,619.83. Therefore we are in the position of recommending that in order to save $844.36 we lose $55,619 by the actual figures of the Commissioner of Pensions himself.

Think of this condition; a committee of five Members of Congress, with only two Federal soldiers thereon, deciding this question when only one Federal soldier was heard in behalf of the movement. Two men on the committee that are not soldiers, nor the sons of soldiers, have decided in the interest of abnormal economy to change the whole system, and it can not be done by jugglery of figures or misstatement of facts cheaper than it is done now, out in the country, among the people in the agencies as they now exist.

Take my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], whose rugged character we all admire, and who distinguished himself on the field of battle. In time of peace, his character and his life have been pure, heroic, and loyal, but the proposition he now makes will cost the United States Government $16,578.48 to do the same work in Washington that was done in the city of Columbus last year by the actual figures of the Commissioner.

Take my distinguished friend from Michigan——

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HALE. I am too busy. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. I just want to ask him if there is a pension agency in Tennessee?

Mr. HALE. The best one of the list. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. In whose district is it?

Mr. HALE. It is in mine. [Laughter.] And I want to say there is not a member of that Appropriation Committee, or any Member on this floor who loves his district and his country, who would not stand and maintain a pension agency at home. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, our distinguished friend from Michigan, who was a Federal soldier and is an orator and a statesman and a gentleman, upon this proposition of the agencies as they now exist, will find that the agency in Detroit paid off 40,685 soldiers 5 cents per capita cheaper in his State last year than the same number could have been paid off in the city of Washington, saving to the Government and to the country $2,034.25. Take my own State—and my colleague is on the subcommittee and he loves the soldiers, because his work shows it—and they have spent $2,000,000 for a Soldiers' Home in his district, and the interest on the money invested and the expense of maintaining them amounts to about $430 per soldier per annum. This is economy in one district, but not economy in another, where we pay off the pensioners from my district at a cost of 53 cents and 1 mill per capita. We saved last year in paying off 64,000 soldiers in the city of Knoxville $8,320 over what it would have cost to do the same work in the city of Washington.

I can not understand for the life of me why, if this is in behalf of good government, if it is in behalf of economy, if it is in behalf of the soldiers that made this country great, the soldiers of the country were not called into council; that the Grand Army posts of the country did not have a hearing; that we who are sons of soldiers were not consulted. Why was it? We heard only the distinguished soldier, who on the bloody battlefield of forty or fifty years ago distinguished himself who is at the head of the Pension Bureau, who for the sake of keeping up the Bureau that is going down recommends it, and for no other reason. He says he would bring all the clerks here. You will find that in the hearings. He says you will have to move out bureaus that are in the Pension Office if they go there. There is no economy in it; they are not begging for it; they are not praying for it; it is not necessary; it is unbusinesslike; it is without need, without cause, without principle of good government, good judgment, good economy, and wisdom of administration. If this country wants to serve well the people that made it great, let us pay those old soldiers and widows every sixty days instead of every ninety days. If we want to serve best the men who suffered on the battlefield, let us take care of them at home, where it is convenient. No one will say that in the pension agency at Knoxville a clerk is employed who does not put in full time between payments, and not one of them gets the average pay that they do here in the city of Washington.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HALE. I have not time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I just want to have the gentleman tell the committee how far Knoxville is from Washington—how many hours it takes to get from Knoxville to Washington.

Mr. HALE. If that has any connection with the question, I do not see it. [Laughter.] We saved on paying out to pensioners $55,619.83 outside of Washington, and in addition to that if you bring the clerks here you have got to raise them an average of $450 each before they have the same average that the clerks in the Pension Bureau now have, and to do this on 435 clerks it increases the pay $195,750. Subtract from this seventeen agencies at $4,000 each and we still have a saving to the Government by doing the work as it is now done of $197,369.83.

That gentlemen may know what is done at the pension agencies between payments, we will take the Knoxville agency for illustration. When the Commissioner of Pensions made his last report at the end of the fiscal year there were about 64,000 names on the rolls. This means that in the time between quarterly payments that number of vouchers must be prepared to be sent to pensioners with their checks, to be executed for the next succeeding payment. For this purpose blanks are furnished, but the names of the pensioners must be filled in, the number and dates of pension certificates, with rank and service. These vouchers are then carefully compared with the rolls one by one to avoid mistakes. This, you will readily see, involves a large amount of labor.

Besides this, the same number of envelopes must be addressed. Original and increase certificates, together with the certificates of widows whose husbands have died, all these must be inscribed carefully on the rolls and vouchers made out and payments made between the dates of the quarterly payments. In this office these payments are made twice a week between these quarterly payments. If it were not done some pensioners would have to wait a long time after being placed upon the rolls before they would get anything. Included in these semiweekly payments are vouchers which have been returned to the pensioners for correction, which are more than 10 per cent of the whole number paid. In addition to all that we are required to make abstracts of all payments made, in which the name of every pensioner is given and time covered by the payment and amount paid.

This abstract is carefully compared in every detail and balanced to a cent and then forwarded to the Auditor for the Interior Department, Treasury Department, with the vouchers for which it is made. Then there is a great deal of careful work to be done in checking and proving the statements of the two subtreasuries who cash the checks drawn by the agency.

For the months succeeding those for which the quarterly payments are made you may readily see that this is a work of considerable magnitude. Besides, you will know that in dealing with this large number of persons there must be a great deal of miscellaneous correspondence which must be attended to and which usually keeps at least one of the clerks busy all of the time. The agency is also required to make a report annually in detail of all the business transacted, which requires many days and weeks of arduous labor which must be done in addition to the routine work.

Anyone who knows anything of the workings of a pension agency may see at a glance that the work of the clerks during the quarterly payments is but a fraction of what they do, and it must be done, no matter where the agency may be located and whether there be one or eighteen of them.

That the public may know that my figures are correct and my statements based upon facts, I submit the following figures furnished me by Commissioner Warner on February 7, 1908, showing cost per pensioner for paying pensioners at each agency in the United States:

Topeka	$0.425
Columbus	.458
Chicago	.518
Knoxville	.509
Indianapolis	.495
Boston	.511
Philadelphia	.530
New York City	.644
Washington	.631
Des Moines	.534
Milwaukee	.544
Buffalo	.564
Pittsburg	.562
San Francisco	.548
Detroit	.582
Louisville	.638
Augusta	.761
Concord	.776

These figures, furnished me by Commissioner Warner, as stated above, show that we pay off soldiers 13 cents cheaper per capita at Knoxville than in the city of Washington, thus saving on 64,000 soldiers $8,320. In addition to the fact that all of the clerks in the agency at Knoxville should be brought to Washington, Commissioner Warner said in the hearings that he would bring all of them here, and then their salaries should be raised $450. To correspond with the salaries now being paid in the Pension Bureau here, it would cost $11,700 more clerk hire to do the same work. Take from this $4,000, which is paid the agent at Knoxville, and we still have a saving to the country by doing this work at Knoxville of $16,020; but for argument's sake suppose that by centralizing the agencies all in one we could save $100,000, being the amount the Commissioner named, what would this amount to? It would save to soldiers and the widows of this nation only 1 cent and a small fraction of a mill per capita, or consider the saving based on population of our nation, 90,000,000 of people, it would save per capita one-tenth of 1 mill, yet the soldiers and widows of our country would, in my judgment, gladly pay an assessment of $1 per capita, if it were necessary, to keep these agencies where they are now, located where their comrades are the agents and clerks; in fact, most of the clerks in these agencies are Federal soldiers, their widows, and their orphans.

They are drawing small salaries, some have their homes in the cities where the agencies are located, and it would be unjust and cruel to move them to Washington; in fact many of them could not come, and their places would be filled by persons who could take the civil service examination, whether or not their qualifications would enable them to plow a horse or build a fire. It would greatly inconvenience the pensioners on account of vouchers being returned for correction, missent, etc. It is estimated that 10 per cent of the total number of vouchers sent out are returned for correction, and sometimes returned two and three times, thus making at all times, being out in the mails of the country, 96,737 drafts thus delayed. It is further estimated that 3,813 soldiers and widows die each month, thus making an average of 381 per month who die without their vouchers, many of whom die in poverty and go into their graves while their checks were going back and forth through the mails of the country. To verify what I here say the following figures were furnished me on February 12 by Commissioner Warner:

Class.	Invalids.	Widows.
Regular Establishment	11,333	3,640
Act of February 6, 1907	271,028
Civil war, general law	151,857	81,011
Act of June 27, 1890	212,934	183,548
War with Spain	19,553	5,091
War of 1812		521
Mexican war	3,233	7,163
Indian wars	1,935	3,186
Total	671,873	287,160

The number of deaths in each class during the calendar year ended December 31, 1907, is as follows:

Class.	Invalids.	Widows.
Regular Establishment	425	164
Act of February 6, 1907	4,821
Civil war, general law	8,304	4,718
Act of June 27, 1890	18,268	7,186
War with Spain	299	127
War of 1812		90
Mexican war	514	463
Indian wars	165	208
Total	32,796	12,956

The pension agencies throughout the country are now run on business principles. They accommodate thousands of local pensioners and they handle the business with economy and promptness. Commissioner Warner admits as much when in the hearings before the committee he says:

> They have been running very satisfactorily, and the agents have been taking care of the business in good shape. We have no fault to find with any of them.

He further stated, which shows there can be no economy in this matter:

> In the Pension Bureau proper we have no more clerks than we need and we have no one to spare to put into the agencies to do their work. It would be necessary to bring some clerks from each agency—possibly all of them to start with—until we could get matters adjusted.

He further stated that it would cost $10,000 additional to move the agencies to Washington, and a new office, known as disbursing clerk, would have to be created. In addition, Mr. Thompson stated they would have to buy some more furniture, and of course the Government would have to pay heavy rent when they move certain bureaus out of the Pension Bureau to make room for the pension agencies. The argument that it would take fewer clerks to do the work in Washington is erroneous, because if clerks are now idle in any agency it is the duty of the pension agent, the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Civil Service Commission to adjust such unreasonable conditions. The truth is they are not idle, but do more work each day, with less pay, than the clerks do in the Departments here in Washington. Let me say again, if we want to do right and the best thing for the soldier and his widow, as well as the Treasury of our country, let us pay, as the Pension Bureau runs down, every sixty days instead of ninety days, and later on every thirty days, thus adding to the comfort of the men and the women who are entitled to the greatest measure of Government support, protection, and consideration.

In closing, let me take the Knoxville agency for illustration, and what I say of it will apply in greater or less extent to every one of them. From Knoxville we pay off the soldiers for ten Southern States. The agent is an ex-Federal soldier, a man who, though born in the South, turned his back on sentiments common to the South in early life and fought for his country and for the honor of our flag. He began editorial work under the great "Parson" Brownlow, and now edits the only Republican daily paper in the Confederate States. He is a man of high standing, of unquestioned character, able, true, and progressive, who commands the respect of all persons and all parties, and, instead of drawing a salary he does not earn, he reflects credit on the office and Administration that appointed him and saves to the Government each year approximately $16,000 by doing the work in Knoxville.

The soldiers paid from this agency were not common soldiers. It was easy for you gentlemen in the North to go into the Union Army, because it was popular and it took more courage not to go, under the circumstances, than it did to go and fight for your country; but not so with the Southern Union man, who was surrounded by a large majority on the other side. His home sentiments were all with the South. He knew that to reach the Union Army he had to take his life in his hands, and after getting through he had to face on the battlefield his own brothers, sometimes father, and many of his schoolmates and neighbors. These men did not know all that you men did in the North about the situation. They only knew they loved their country and were ready to fight for their flag, and notwithstanding it seemed that the tide was against them, still they stood firm, like the oak on the hilltop that bends in the storm to straighten with renewed strength in the sunlight of the calm.

When they went to battle the future looked dark. They knew the South had endless summer, which would enable the enemy to carry on war without interruption; mountains of iron, lead, and material for prosecuting war; mountains in whose gorges armies could intrench themselves to great advantage. It seemed to them that foreign nations favored the South; that the fleet of less than ninety vessels prior to that date had been shifted to Southern seas; that Lincoln was at the head of a new party and both the President and the party untried; the Treasury of the nation was empty, and bonds could not be sold at 12 per cent. Besides this, many of the strong men of West Point had declared for the Southern Confederacy; but in the midst of this appalling situation in the section they loved, with nothing but darkness before them, they stood like Spartan heroes for their country's flag, for the glory and honor of the greatest nation the world has ever seen.

Let us not take from these heroic men, their widows and their orphans the only Southern pension agency they have. Let us not insult them in the name of economy, but give them loyal support, protection, and comfort during their day. Other men can speak for their constituents and the soldiers of their section as they please; as for my part I shall stand for the protection, comfort, and consideration of the Union soldier who dared to fight in his country's name.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, this debate illustrates how difficult it is to abolish an office after it has once been established, and it seems that the more unnecessary offices there are the greater the difficulty in getting rid of any of them. This is purely a business question, and it relates to the efficiency and economy of the administration of the pension laws of the country. The matter has been carefully investigated by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Commissioner of Pensions, and they report to the Congress that the laws can be as efficiently administered as they are now by the abolition of seventeen of the eighteen pension offices, and there may be a saving to the country of from two to five hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman give us the figures for that $500,000 a year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] made the statement a while ago that the saving would, in his judgment, be $500,000 a year.

Mr. DALZELL. Does not the Commissioner of Pensions say that the administration of law under this proposed system would cost just as much, so far as clerk hire is concerned? Did he not say that the same number of clerks and the same clerks would have to be retained?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He may have.

Mr. DALZELL. He did.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But I am not even bound by that. This is the age of consolidation. What does the argument amount to, then, in favor of consolidation of great industries of the country in order that they may avail themselves of economies in production if it is not likewise true of the pension business?

The same philosophy applies to the business agencies of the Government as applies to private industry. It is recognized by every economist in the country that there is a great saving in consolidation, in combination, and I believe the gentleman from Ohio is nearer right perhaps than the Secretary of the Interior when he estimates the saving to the country of a half million dollars a year resulting from the abolition of seventeen out of eighteen pension agencies. I am sure it will not result in any sort of inconvenience to the pensioners. Pensions are paid quarterly. Every man and every woman who holds a pension certificate will receive a payment four times a year. There can only be an interim of three months between payments. It can not possibly result in an injury to a single pensioner of the country. It is a movement in the interest of public economy. Congress has an opportunity to save from $200,000 to $500,000 a year without in any degree inconveniencing a single citizen or embarrassing the administration of this important feature of government.

The State of Indiana has a pension agency, one in which we all feel a considerable local pride. I am personally well acquainted with the gentleman who is in charge of that agency. He is a personal and political friend of mine, and I do not like to see him lose his job, but, Mr. Chairman, this question is one larger than patronage, larger than spoils. It is a question of public economy, and every member of the Committee of the Whole, in my judgment, ought to overlook these personal propositions, these personal questions, and consider it altogether as a business proposition. Can we save any money by this change? I think there can be no sort of doubt that we can. Will it result in any inconvenience to any considerable number of the citizens of the Republic? It can not possibly so result. Those are the only problems, Mr. Chairman, involved in the consideration of the question, and I am glad of this opportunity to say a word in favor of the proposition reported by the Committee on Appropriations in favor of abolishing seventeen useless—I will not say altogether useless—but in favor of consolidating the seventeen offices into one, whereby we can bring about a substantial saving of public revenues.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I propose to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], and I propose to support it on what I consider to be good grounds of public policy. Now, what is the situation? The law provides that the President shall be authorized to appoint so many pension agents as in his judgment the public interests and convenience of the pensioners shall require. In the exercise of that judgment the President of the United States has appointed eighteen pension agents, and we have from year to year been appropriating for their salaries. What is the proposition now? That we shall cut off seventeen of those pension agents. By an express provision of law? Not at all; but we shall refuse to appropriate for seventeen and appropriate only for the remaining one. If points of order had been decided as I think they ought to have been from the beginning, such a provision as that would have been subject to a point of order; because it is in point of fact a change of existing law. It is not, under the precedents, however, subject to a point of order, because it has been held that Congress may appropriate or fail to appropriate as it sees fit. But the failure of Congress to appropriate for these seventeen pension agents does not strike down the agencies as offices.

Each and every one of those agents can go to the Court of Claims and claim and recover for his salary until such time as his office may be properly abolished by law. Now, where does the power exist to abolish these offices by law? It exists in the President of the United States or in Congress. The President of the United States has indicated no wish upon his part that these seventeen offices shall be abolished——

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, not at all. The President of the United States is not in the habit of keeping from Congress what he wants Congress to do. I shall vote for the abolition of these offices when I hear from the President of the United States that he wants to have them abolished and assigns a good reason therefor. Now, then, there is a great deal of declamation about the amount of money that is going to be saved. The gentleman who has just taken his seat is going to save a half million of dollars. Now, let us look at the figures, vague as they are. The committee proposes to save the salaries of seventeen pension agents, at $4,000 a year. That is $68,000. It then concedes by provision in its bill that the money to be saved in the payment of clerk hire is $100,000.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Has the gentleman any of these agencies in Pennsylvania?

Mr. DALZELL. That makes no difference at all. I understand what the gentleman means by his question. There are two agencies in Pennsylvania. There is one in Pittsburg, and I am arguing for that agency here to-day, and I am not ashamed of it, either. [Applause.] I care nothing for the gentleman's peanut politics.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I just wanted to get the gentleman on record, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, "the gentleman from Pennsylvania" never yet failed to go on record. [Applause.] How are you going to save $100,000 in clerk hire if it be true that you must have the same number of clerks at the same salary that they are being paid now?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DALZELL. I do not care to be interrupted. I have——

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to have the gentleman read what the Commissioner says about keeping the same number. I will hand it to him. It is contained in three lines.

Mr. DALZELL. I will read from page 7.

Commissioner WARNER. Oh, yes. We will want the same clerks. We would bring the majority of them from each agency here with their records, so as to have them go right to work. In the Pension Bureau proper we have no more clerks than we need, and we have no one to spare to put in the agencies to do that work.

Now, how are you going to save $100,000 in clerk hire if you have to bring the old clerks here to do the same work? You can not do it. But concede the proposition of the committee—that they can save $100,000—is the game worth the candle? Certainly not. You are going to turn out of office eighteen veteran soldiers of the civil war who are at the head of these pension agencies, and properly there. You are going to turn out of office—for that is what it means—all or most all of the clerks employed in these various offices. Talk about bringing clerks from San Francisco to Washington to serve as employees in the Pension Office! And many of these clerks—I speak from knowledge of my own town—are the widows and the orphans of soldiers, so that the sum total of what you propose to do here to-day, not in an open, manly way, but by indirection, is to discharge eighteen veteran soldiers and the widows and orphans of many others. I submit to you, gentlemen, the game is not worth the candle. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire just to add a word or two to the debate that has taken place. I have observed that most of the Members who have spoken in favor of this amendment put it on the ground of the injury to be done to the old soldiers by changing our present plan. I have been a pretty faithful attendant at the Grand Army reunions, and I want to say to you that the old soldiers do not care anything about it at all. They are anxious to get their pensions, but they do not care whether they are sent to them from Washington, Indianapolis, Topeka, or San Francisco. It would be impossible for even the silver-tongued orators, who have just addressed you on this subject, to get up a particle of enthusiasm among the old soldiers as to the place where they are going to be paid. They will get their money every three months anyhow.

I have not gone through these figures. I do not know how much saving there will be, but if there is a proposition at any time that will come up in this House to save one dollar to the Government which can just as well be saved, I will support it. [Applause.]

This is a business proposition, wholly and purely. It has been said here that the President, in his discretion, can reduce the number of these agents. Well, the President has it in his discretion to do many things, but the President would not be justified in reducing the number of these agents as long as Congress appropriated for their pay. Whenever we appropriate to pay for eighteen agents, that is a notice to the President that Congress wants to keep eighteen agents, and when we vote to appropriate for one agent, that is a notice to the President that we only want one agent. And history will show, and the President can see this very clearly, and he will quickly respond to the demands of the country.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], in discussing this matter, spoke of the Secretary of the Interior having the confidence of the President. I want to add to that, Mr. Chairman, that not only the Secretary of the Interior, but every member of the President's Cabinet has not only the confidence of the President, but the confidence of the American people to a very great and unprecedented extent. [Applause.] I was a little surprised that my genial friend from New York, who generally talks business, should have interjected politics into this discussion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no politics in it, I want to say; oh, no politics!

Mr. HOLLIDAY. If there was not any politics in the gentleman's speech, I must admit that I do not know what a political speech is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no politics in the appointments the President has made, either; that is, some people do not think so.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to give what I think is a very good reason for the attitude of my friend the gentleman from New York. The newspapers have stated that another gentleman from New York, a man whose silvery eloquence has often held spellbound this Chamber, is about to be disciplined because he is not a Democrat. I do not know whether that is true or not, but my notion is that the gentleman from New York who has just spoken is afraid that he will be brought up upon the green carpet, and he is getting ready to prove an alibi; and he can do it. He could do it; he could get every Member of the House here and make it complete. He could prove not only that he is a Democrat, but works at it all the time. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look at this as a purely business proposition. There is an agency within a few miles of my home. I can get there in one hour. The man who holds the place is a personal friend of mine, one of the noblest men God ever made, a magnificent fellow. If we are going to have any sinecures I want him to have one, although I am opposed to sinecures. The argument is made that we will save the Government, and wherever we can save the Government money we ought to do it. It is said that a distinguished gentleman, once speaking on the tariff question, said it was "a local question." [Laughter.] I have noticed that whenever a man gets up and eloquently pleads for the retention of a place in the interest of an old soldier, it turns out that somebody in his immediate neighborhood holds down the job. [Great laughter.]

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly not reflect on the committee having this bill in charge, but I think it must be manifest to every gentleman in the House that the inquiry presented by it is very inconclusive. One year ago Congress asked that an inquiry be made, and what has the committee given us? The brief examination of two witnesses. Who are they? The Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior. Two gentlemen well informed in their business; an able Cabinet officer and a splendid Commissioner. But, gentlemen, I undertake to say that they know absolutely nothing by experience, by observation, or by investigation, except an ex parte one, of the workings of the system which they have been asked to make. If we are to create a United States judicial district, we would not be satisfied with the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. MANN. Is it true that the Judiciary Committee, in reporting bills for new judicial districts, do not make inquiry of the Attorney-General as to the amount of business?

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. It does make inquiry of the Attorney-General, but the gentleman is anticipating the illustration. We not only get the opinion of the Attorney-General, but the opinion of the local or district judge, and of the district attorney of the district; nay, more, we often seek the opinion of United States commissioners, of attorneys, and of others who may be informed of the needs. Now, if the gentlemen who have charge of this bill had inquired of the local pension agents, of the pensioners, and of other people who have a personal knowledge of the working of the present system, do you believe there would be the paucity of information that exists here to-day on this subject? Who knows by this report how much will be saved? Who has been able to tell us?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is there a pension agency in your district?

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. There is a pension agency in Buffalo. The agent is an old soldier, and I am glad to speak for him and for the clerks, and especially for the system as it exists to-day, and which I believe is more economical than the one proposed. [Applause.] A full, free investigation would disclose it. What we have before us is simply theory; what we need are facts. The committee asks us to vote about what this House knows nothing. It attempts to teach us from their own ignorance. I protest against that sort of an inquiry. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HALE] informs us that the work of his agency can be done for $8,000 less at home than in Washington. If I should speak for the agency at Buffalo I might show an equal or greater saving. A proper investigation would have removed this question of economy. As it is, the committee assumes, and this House must assume, without knowledge if it supports the committee, that the proposed change will save the Government money. Why not assume that an investigation in which both sides are heard will show the present system to be the more economical? Abundant reason has been given by gentlemen why, if existing conditions are more economical, the change should not be made, and since the committee is not informed on the question of economy, why not allow the matter to remain as it is until accurate information is before us?

This is not a question of reform. The existing way is as clean and wholesome as the proposed system. The proposed change on the part of the Government is only to save expense, and as to this no two reports agree. One gentleman says it will save $500,000; another, $200,000; a third, $120,000, while it has been pointed out on this floor this afternoon that the report, in fact, shows an actual increased cost of over $100,000. Why this haste when there is so much doubt? The Commissioner of Pensions admits that the greater part of the clerks now doing the business must be transferred to Washington, and if transferred here, it is admitted that their salaries, because of the greater cost of living, must be increased. The change therefore, if made, means to the clerks giving up settled homes, breaking up the associations of a lifetime, and coming to a strange city to do for a larger salary what they now do and can do for less salary. And all for what? Simply to save, as the report says, $200,000. If this were certain, there might be the miser's excuse. But it is probably not certain. It is based only on assumption. There is not a gentleman in this House to-day that has accurate information. And I believe, if the pension agents, who can give facts and who have thus far not been officially heard, could be given a hearing, the committee's report would show an increase of cost. The statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, showing a saving of $8,000, indicates it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What agency was it that would save $8,000?

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. The agency in Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HALE], who has just spoken, made that statement.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Michigan, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Michigan, a member of the committee, may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, those present who were Members of the Fifty-ninth Congress will recall that in the pension appropriation bill, as reported to the House a year ago, there was a provison for the payment of but nine pension agents. At that time this feature of the bill was discussed at length, the final result of which was that the report of the committee was so amended as to appropriate for the payment of but one agency. The Senate refused to concur in the House action touching the consolidation, and the matter went to conference. After prolonged efforts the conferees were unable to agree, and reported the fact back to their respective Houses. Each body sustained its representatives on the committees and further efforts were made to harmonize the differences, but without avail, save in an agreement to submit to the Secretary of the Interior the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make inquiry and report to Congress, at the beginning of its next regular session, the effect of a reduction of the present pension agencies to one such agency upon the economic execution of the pension laws, the prompt and efficient payment of pensioners, and the inconvenience to pensioners, if any, which would result from such reduction. This provision shall not be construed as interfering with or limiting the right or power of the President under existing law in respect to reduction or consolidation of existing pension agencies.

Pending investigation and report of the Secretary and until further action by Congress, the number of pension agencies were to remain at eighteen.

On December 13 last the honorable Secretary of the Interior, after a careful investigation of the whole subject, sent to the Congress his report, in which, among other things, he says:

1. Economic execution of pension laws.—The annual expenditure on account of the payment of pensions, including the salaries of pension agents, clerk hire, contingent expenses, and the printing of vouchers and checks, is approximately $550,000, an average cost per pensioner of 55 cents per annum. It is estimated that after a consolidation has been completed and in perfect working order all pensioners could be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions or one disbursing officer, located in the city of Washington, with an annual expenditure of, at most, $350,000, a saving of 20 cents per annum per pensioner, or $200,000. After the first year of the consolidation I am of the opinion that the appropriation for the expense of paying pensions could be safely reduced at least $25,000 more.

2. The prompt and efficient payment of pensioners.—If all pensioners are paid by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, provision should be made for a division of the pensioners into three groups, one group to be paid each month, as at present, and all pensioners could be paid as promptly by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, as by eighteen agents.

3. Inconvenience to pensioners.—As all pensioners could be paid as promptly by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, as by eighteen agents, there would be no inconvenience to pensioners except the slight delay which would be caused in the case of pensioners living remote from Washington in the time required for a voucher to reach Washington through the mails and for the check to be returned. The checks would, however, be issued quarterly as now and the pensioner receive his payment regularly every three months after the receipt of the first payment.

This report covers and fully sustains every point of contention made by the advocates of consolidation in the last Congress. These points are three. First, that consolidation will not result in inconvenience to the pensioners. Second, that it will not interfere with the prompt and efficient payment of the pensioners. Third, that it will result in an economic execution of the pension laws and therefore be a material saving to the Government. The most serious objection that has been urged against the consolidation is the alleged inconvenience to which it would subject the pensioners and the delay it would cause in the receipt of the quarterly allowance. No one now, who has investigated the matter, seriously uses this argument in favor of retention of the present number of agencies. The most that can possibly be said in favor of this objection is that in making the readjustment there might be a slight delay in sending the first remittance after the consolidation, but all subsequent payments would be made at regular ninety-day intervals, as now.

On the question of more economic administration of the pension laws, the authorities seem to be in accord. On this point the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, who by common consent is one of the most competent officials who ever filled that important position and himself accustomed to the handling of large business affairs, says:

The appropriation to start with would be reduced $100,000 on the item of clerk hire for the first year anyway, and it would be more than that after we got the thing adjusted and running in good shape. There would also be a reduction of $72,000 on account of the salaries of agents; but it would be necessary, unless you required the Commissioner of Pensions to sign vouchers, to have a disbursing officer do that, and to give bond. As far as I, personally, am concerned, it would be better for me if the agencies should remain just as they are, as their consolidation would make me additional responsibility and labor; but looking at it from a business point of view—and as if it were my own business—I would consolidate them instantly, or as soon as it could be done. It would be more economical for the Government, and it would work better than to have these agencies scattered all over the country. The work would go smoother, mistakes could be corrected more quickly, information obtained at once, and the records be kept in better shape.

Secretary Garfield, in a recent hearing before the subcommittee on the pension appropriation bill, said:

That by the concentration and centralization of the handling of this work here in Washington, with the present organization in the Pension Office, and with the possibility of the introduction, as we could then, of certain mechanical devices for the handling of these hundreds of thousands of vouchers and certificates, we could, without interfering at all with the expedition with which the pensioners receive their claims, transact all of that business here and mail the checks to the various parts of the country, receiving the vouchers quite as quickly as it is now done under separate agencies.

The saving, as we figure it, will be something over $200,000, and I believe it will be even more than that when we put into effect all of the systematized business methods that can be put into effect if this work is brought here. I believe that the saving would be nearer $350,000 a year, in administration, and without any loss to the pensioners in expeditiously receiving their pensions, and without in any way interfering with the handling of the present business in the settlement of claims presented.

Over against these statements and findings of the Pension Commissioner and the Secretary of the Interior, made in their official capacity after the most painstaking and careful investigation and presumably without any selfish interest involved, we have, in a letter written to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania by the pension agent at Philadelphia and widely circulated among Members of Congress, a labored effort to controvert the conclusions of the Commissioner and Secretary, saying, among other things, that the "proposed plan" of the Secretary is "expensive" and "impracticable," and that he (the Secretary) "significantly fails" to make good his contention. Pension Agent Mulholland figures out that it will cost more to pay the pensioners in Washington through one agency than it does now through eighteen scattered all over the country. He says:

If the 432 clerks now in the agency service should receive the same average salaries as are paid to clerks in the Bureau of Pensions, it would cost the Government for clerk hire $125,000 more than it now does.

This assumption of the Philadelphia pension agent reminds me of General Grant's answer to critics of his management of some of his campaigns. The critics had alleged that if the plans of the Confederate generals had been carried out as designed the result of certain battles would have been different. Grant said:

If all the Confederate campaigns had been executed as planned, and if all the bullets fired by the enemy had hit, and if all the bullets fired by the Union soldiers had missed, the war would probably have ended differently than it did.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Mulholland, the Philadelphia pension agent, assumes that it will require as many clerks to pay the pensioners from one office as from eighteen, and that while the number of clerks will be the same the rate of compensation will be much higher, and consequently it will increase rather than diminish the expense if consolidation is effected. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. HALE] and several other gentlemen who have participated in this discussion have fallen into the error of arguing from insufficient data and of drawing conclusions from false premises. The gentleman from Tennessee maintains that it costs, at the present relative rates, $8,000 less to pay the pensioners from the Knoxville agency than it would to pay a like number from the Washington agency, and he therefore concludes that to pay all from this city would greatly increase the sum total. As pertinent to this point and as an answer to others who have, by similar arguments, supported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, I submit the following letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, and which I desire to have incorporated with my remarks:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, February 5, 1908.

Hon. WASHINGTON GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GARDNER: Replying to your personal inquiry of this date relative to the comparative cost of paying pensions at the Philadelphia and Washington agencies, you are advised as follows:

The amount disbursed for clerk hire at the Philadelphia agency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, was $26,399.50. The number of pensioners on the rolls at this agency at the close of the last fiscal year was 58,295. The average cost per pensioner for clerk hire was 45 cents. The amount disbursed for clerk hire at the Washington agency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, was $27,847.80. The number of pensioners on the rolls of the Washington agency June 30, 1907, was 53,640. The average cost per pensioner was 52 cents.

While the amount disbursed for clerk hire at the Washington agency is about 5 per cent greater than the amount paid at the Philadelphia agency, the amount of work involved in the conduct of the Washington agency is from 10 to 20 per cent greater than that involved in the conduct of the Philadelphia agency, for the following reasons: The pensions of all foreign pensioners are paid by the Washington agency, as well as the fees of all examining surgeons. There are more than 5,000 examining surgeons in the United States, and the fees are paid quarterly. The work involved in the payment of fees of examining surgeons is considered equivalent to the payment of an equal number of pensioners. The extra labor in the payment of pensioners residing in foreign countries is due to several causes—difficulty in determining the correct post-office addresses and in addressing the envelopes, the addresses in most cases being three times as long as the post-office addresses in the United States, the work of comparison is three times as great, and in addition to this, constant reference must be made to guides in order to determine the correct spelling of the names and addresses, many of which are in the language of the country, requiring translation.

The labor involved in the examination of pension vouchers executed in foreign countries is from three to five times as great as that involved in the examination of vouchers executed in this country. Vouchers may be executed in the United States before any officer authorized to administer oaths for general purposes or before any fourth-class postmaster. If such officer is authorized to use a seal the impression of his seal on the voucher is taken as prima facie evidence of his authority without further verification. In foreign countries vouchers may be executed before an ambassador, minister, or consul or other consular officer of the United States, or before any civil officer of the country duly authorized to administer oaths or to authenticate extra-judicial documents, and whose official character and signature shall be authenticated by the certificate of an ambassador, minister, or consul or other consular officer of the United States. On account of the variation in the laws of different countries relative to the officers authorized to administer oaths or to take affirmations constant reference is required in the examination of vouchers executed in such countries to determine whether such vouchers were executed in accordance with the regulations relative thereto. While franked envelopes are used in addressing domestic pensioners, postage stamps must be affixed to all communications to pensioners residing in foreign countries. The affixing of these stamps as well as the weighing of doubtful letters or packets also requires extra time and labor.

It is estimated, therefore, that the pension agency in this city could, with its present number of employees, pay with equal facility 68,000 pensioners in the United States if it were not required to pay the pensioners residing in foreign countries and the fees of examining surgeons. This would reduce the cost per pensioner to 41 cents.

The number of pensioners on the rolls of the Knoxville agency—the nearest in size which can be fairly compared with the Washington agency—was at the close of the last fiscal year 63,890, and the amount disbursed for clerk hire was $28,153.50, or $305.70 more than paid at the Washington agency. The amount of work required at the Washington agency, in view of the foregoing pensioners and fees of examining surgeons, is believed to be greater than that required at the Knoxville agency.

The number of clerks employed at the Philadelphia agency is 26; at the Knoxville agency, 27, and at the Washington agency, 25. While the average salary paid at the Washington agency is greater than at the Philadelphia agency, this is due to the fact that the Washington agent prefers to conduct the business with a smaller number of clerks and the payment of higher salaries, while the Philadelphia agent prefers a larger number of clerks and lower salaries.

Very respectfully,

V. WARNER, Commissioner.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the letter goes far to refute the repeated assertion that neither the Commissioner of Pensions nor the Secretary of the Interior had gone into this subject with any degree of thoroughness.

Fortunately, in further refutation, we have Secretary Garfield's clear and businesslike statement as to how, in his judgment, a single office can be so organized and equipped with modern mechanical devices as to greatly facilitate the payments and so reduce the number of clerks and materially lessen the total expense. There are also some illustrations in concrete form as to the relative number of clerks required under the present system in the agencies paying the largest number of pensions as compared with the smaller and also the relative cost per pensioner in each. The agency at Topeka, Kans., for example, pays 111,508 pensioners with a force of 39 clerks, or 2,859 to each clerk. The Concord agency pays 16,117 pensioners with a force of 10 clerks, or 1,611 per clerk. The Augusta agency pays 17,303 with a force of 12 clerks, or at the rate of 1,442 per clerk. In other words, it requires almost double the number of clerks to pay a pensioner in the smaller agencies as in the largest. The Topeka agency pays its pensioners at an average cost of 42½ cents, while one of the small New England agencies costs 76.1 and the agency at Concord, N. H., 77.6 cents per pensioner. This comparative statement alone, taken as it is from the official records, ought to convince any unprejudiced person of the wisdom of consolidation if, as the Secretary and the Commissioner hold and the Committee on Appropriations believe, it will not result in inconvenience nor delay to the pensioners. At a time when it requires the unprecedented sum of $160,000,000 to pay the pensions for a single year and when the current expenses of the Government are exceeding its revenues by several millions a month surely it is the part of good legislation to save even the comparatively paltry sum of a quarter of a million dollars annually if it can be done without injury or prejudice to any individual or interest save that of the pension agents and the cities where the agencies are located. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that affects the comfort and convenience of the old soldiers. They are, and so am I, opposed to the abolition of the pension agencies of our country. [Applause.] No good reason has been advanced for their consolidation in the city of Washington. The advocates of the proposition are as unpatriotic as they are inconsistent. Some of them say it will not abolish an office; that it will not throw an old soldier out of his position; and others say that it will be in the interest of economy. If the consolidation will not throw an old soldier out of his job, then how can there be any economy in centralizing all the pension agencies in the country in one bureau here in Washington? [Laughter and applause.] Explain that, if you can. It is beyond my ken.

Now, sir, let me say to those who talk about economy, I will be with you whenever you want to economize for the best interests of the overburdened taxpayers of the country. If you want to retrench and reform for real economy, do not begin by striking a blow at the rights of the soldiers and sailors who saved the Union. [Applause.] They get little enough now. If you want to economize, stop legislating for subsidies that rob the many for the benefit of the few. [Applause.] If you want to economize in the interest of the consumers and the taxpayers of the country, bring in a bill to reduce the high protective tariff taxes that shelter monopoly and enhance the price of the necessaries of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But do not strike down the old soldier. The country owes him much, and the little he gets should not be taken away in a spasm of false economy. I am now, always have been, and always will be, a friend of the soldiers and sailors of the Union, and while I am a Member of this House I will never do anything to impair their rights. We owe a debt to the heroic defenders of the Union that can never be paid. Let us be just to them. [Applause.] And let us be just to their widows and their orphans. [Applause.]

This bill abolishes seventeen pension agencies, long established, honestly managed, and efficiently and economically conducted, and, say what you will, I know that their disestablishment will throw a number of old soldiers out of employment, but beyond that, far more important than that, it will make it harder and take longer for every old soldier to get his pension money.

This proposed consolidation is not only unjust, but it is penny wise and pound foolish. It is cheeseparing in the most miserly way to the detriment of our soldiers and sailors. It is false economy in the most narrow sense, and I am surprised that so good a friend of the soldier as the gentleman from Ohio [General KEIFER] would lend himself to the proposition. But I am consoled in the knowledge that another distinguished Member from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] has offered the pending amendment to leave these pension agencies just as they are and just where they are. [Applause.] I shall support that amendment with all my heart, and I hope the pariotic Members of this House will rise to the occasion and that every friend of our old soldiers will vote with me for the amendment—for the old soldiers—and for the continuance of the pension agencies. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendment be closed in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendment be closed in ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, some very astonishing statements have been made in the course of this debate. Perhaps the most astonishing is the one that states that the pensions can be paid more cheaply in Washington than elsewhere in the country. Now, I have been in and around Washington for a few years and pay a little expense account now and then, and I have failed to find a single item of expense less here than I find it elsewhere in the country. I have been looking over the report of the Commissioner of Pensions and have been making some deductions from his figures. I find that the clerks who pay the pensions here now receive on an average $1,280.72 each, while the clerks in the rest of the country, out in the other agencies, that are proposed to be abolished in the interest of economy, receive on an average the sum of $977.99.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Would the gentleman's State be affected if these offices were abolished?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, there is an agency in Topeka, Kans., and there is an agent there, and a number of clerks, among whom there are a large number of old soldiers on the pay roll. It is not in my district. I have no relative on the pay roll in that agency. Now, is there anything else the gentleman would like to know along that line?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Yes; I want to know if the gentleman's job is dependent on the abolishing of this agency?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No; my "job" is not dependent on the maintenance of the agency at Topeka. Is there anything further in the line of high politics and great statesmanship that the gentleman wants to know?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. The gentleman is in favor of reform?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, I am; and that is the reason I am for retaining these offices out in the country, where men are employed at $300 less per year than they are employed here in the city of Washington; I am for maintaining the agencies where the expenses are less and where the rent is less, and where families can live more cheaply than they can here, and where the clerks now own their own homes in many instances. Why, if the gentleman is a great reformer, and if the committee is bent on reform and wants to save money, I want to give them an idea of how they can save in the neighborhood of $200,000 a year on the payment of the pensions. It would cost at the rate at which pensioners were paid last year in the Washington agency, to pay the 967,371 pensioners, something over $502,000. If these same 967,371 pensioners were paid in Topeka, Kans., at the rate they were paid there by the clerks who were receiving a less salary, and whom you propose to abolish, they could be paid for $369,535.72. In the interest of economy, why does not the committee move that all these pensioners be paid at Topeka, Kans.?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill proposes to have just one agency, but does not state where it is to be located. If the gentleman is right, I may say that one will be established at Topeka; so Topeka is safe. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. But I think the intention of the committee and the Commissioner is to consolidate them all in Washington when the consolidation is made. Just on this point I picked up the following newspaper clipping some days ago, which is under the small caption of "Consolidation of pension agencies:"

Many Members of Congress are being urged by their friends among the residents of Washington to do what they can to secure the recommendation of the Appropriations Committee for the consolidation of the seventeen existing pension agencies into one, to be located at Washington——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am for Topeka. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. So am I. But to go on:

If this is done, it will increase the local income from Government salaries in the District of Columbia more than $350,000.

Every little bit helps. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, certainly, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are not all papers, in the main; all the money, in the main; all the letters, in the main, sent to the pensioners started from Washington?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for three minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee has already voted to close debate in ten minutes, and it was the understanding that the gentleman from Kansas was to have five minutes of that time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, at this juncture, when all is ready for the fray, I desire to bring up the Grand Army of the Republic. I have in my hand two communications, one from the Grand Army association of the city of Philadelphia and vicinity, comprising forty-three Grand Army posts, with a membership of 10,000 soldiers and sailors.

Also, a communication from the department commander of the Department of the Grand Army of the Republic, State of Pennsylvania, comprising 100,000 pensioners. These I desire to have incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The communications are as follows:

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA AND VICINITY,
Philadelphia, February 6, 1908.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: On behalf of the forty-three posts of the Grand Army Association of Philadelphia and vicinity, representing 10,000 old soldiers and sailors, I beg to file a protest against the contemplated change in the payment of pensions. As now existing the system is excellent, prompt, and efficient, and most agreeable to the pensioners, every one of whom protest against the contemplated change. No argument is advanced for the change except that it might save $170,000 per annum to the Government, and this seems very uncertain. It may be so in theory, but when put in practice may result in a very different condition, and most likely will be an increase in the expenses rather than a saving. But leaving out all questions of economy, the convenience and wishes of the pensioners should be consulted, and they are solidly against the transfer to Washington of the agency.

Very truly, yours,

JOSEPH R. CRAIG,
President, Grand Army Association.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Philadelphia, Pa., February 4, 1908.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of more than 100,000 pensioners of the State of Pennsylvania, I beg to enter my most earnest protest against the abolishing of the pension agencies as proposed by the Secretary of the Interior, firmly believing that such change would work a hardship to the pensioners, as well as to not reduce the expense of the distribution now in vogue at the respective agencies.

Very truly, yours,

WM. T. POWELL,
Department Commander.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and several other gentleman, I, too, received resolutions from the local Grand Army posts of several counties in my Congressional district protesting against the proposed action of the Committee on Appropriations. Whereupon I wrote to the commander or to the adjutant of each post, explaining the reason for the proposed consolidation and its effect, and I mailed to each a copy of the testimony upon which the action of the committee is based, and now I am receiving from these same officers, from the same posts, letters like the following:

PLAINVIEW, MINN., March 17, 1908.

Hon. J. A. TAWNEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of 13th instant to J. N. Ross, commander of our Grand Army of the Republic post, would say, after investigating the matter, the post has come to the conclusion that they acted a little hasty in the matter, and request that you take no action in regard to papers sent you. I did not attend the meeting, but signed the paper, as it was represented to me to be the wishes of the post.

Respectfully, yours,

R. R. DAMOUDE,
Adjutant, Post 107, G. A. R.

Mr. Chairman, the interest of the old soldier is on the side of the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations. I have served in this House for many years, and no man can charge against me any act or vote that was not in the interests of the men who preserved our Union. We have all received letters from old soldiers in our respective districts complaining on account of the delay of their first pension after the issuing of the certificate, and upon investigation I have discovered that the delay is due to the duplication in service in consequence of the existence of these agencies, and the proposition to consolidate these agencies is to do away with this duplication and hasten the payment of pensions. The certificate allowing the pension must first be recorded in the office here in Washington, and then it must be sent to the agency and again recorded there. By reason of this duplication of service payment of the pension due the old soldiers is delayed. It is to make these payments as prompt as possible and save to the Government about $400,000 annually that the committee recommend this consolidation. But we have further evidence of the fact that the interest of the old soldier will be served by adopting the recommendation of the committee. The only men who have spoken in favor of the recommendation of the committee from States that have pension agencies are members of the Grand Army of the Republic in this House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY] has an agency in his State, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] has an agency in his State, and the gentleman in charge of this bill [General KEIFER] has an agency in his State. They have all served in the Union Army, and I think the House of Representatives should accept the judgment and the recommendation of these distinguished old soldiers, who know and tell us that the interests of their comrades are and will be better served by adopting the proposed legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. KEIFER. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER), there were—ayes 85, noes 145.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee divided, and the tellers (Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, and Mr. KEIFER) reported that there were—ayes 86, and noes 131.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerk hire, and other services, in the pension agencies, $335,000: Provided, That the amount of clerk hire, and other services, and the salaries paid shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon that paragraph. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. You make an appropriation here for clerk hire of $335,000 and then have a proviso that the amount of clerk hire shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, that is the same provision and limitation that has been in prior bills on this same subject, only the amount appropriated is $100,000 less than in former years.

Mr. TAWNEY. The proviso has been carried in previous bills.

Mr. KEIFER. And is a mere limitation——

Mr. MANN. It is not a limitation as far as that is concerned, but that point is neither here nor there. Mr. Chairman, I am not discussing the point of order. The item is clearly subject to the point of order——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will explain. I think the reason the proviso was inserted is this: There is a lump sum appropriated for clerical services in these agencies. Now, the amount of salary to be paid without this provision would be fixed by the agent in charge of the agency. This is to make definite and certain that the Secretary of the Interior shall approve the salaries that are fixed in the agencies before those salaries shall become effective.

Mr. MANN. The language of this bill would permit the Secretary of the Interior to exceed the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the language that has been carried for years. That is the reason for it.

Mr. MANN. If it has been in the bills heretofore and they have not exceeded the amount of the appropriation——

Mr. TAWNEY. They never have.

Mr. MANN. But under this provision they can. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and directed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to arrange the pensioners, for the payment of pensions, in three groups as he may think proper; and he may from time to time change any pensioner from one group to another as he may deem convenient for the transaction of the public business. The pensioners in the first group shall be paid their quarterly pension on January 4, April 4, July 4, and October 4 of each year; the pensioners in the second group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on February 4, May 4, August 4, and November 4 of each year; and the pensioners in the third group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on March 4, June 4, September 4, and December 4 of each year. The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby fully authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to cause payments of pensions to be made for the fractional parts of quarters created by such changes so as to properly adjust all payments as herein provided.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the paragraph from line 7, on page 4, down to and including line 25. It is new legislation.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order. It only embarrasses the Pension Bureau in the matter of making the payments. It will not prevent the operation of the law otherwise. It is a suggestion that comes from the Secretary of the Interior with the approval of the Commissioner, and he desired that in order to facilitate this great deduction that is to be had in the way of disestablishing a number of agencies, taking away seventeen bureaus somewhere and having but one here.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair it is clearly new legislation, and therefore subject to a point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

In case of sickness or unavoidable absence of the agent for payment of pensions from his office, the Commissioner of Pensions may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, authorize the chief clerk of his office or some other clerk employed therein to temporarily act as such agent for payment of pensions.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph. It is new legislation.

Mr. KEIFER. It is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

And with the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior, the agent for payment of pensions may designate and authorize the necessary number of clerks to sign the name of the agent for payment of pensions to official checks.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

The official bond given by the agent for payment of pensions shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendment to the House, and recommend their passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSEND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16268, the pension appropriation bill, and had directed him to report it to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill and the amendment.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEIFER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOARD OF VISITORS, NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the following communication:

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 18, 1908.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I assure you that I very much appreciate the honor of being appointed a member of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I beg to say, however, that it will be impossible for me to serve in that capacity. My legislative duties are such that I could not give it attention, and therefore respectfully decline.

Thanking you, I am,
Yours, very truly,
JOHN A. STERLING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 624. An act providing for the appointment of an appraiser of merchandise for the customs collection district of Puget Sound, State of Washington—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 20, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BURROWS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

PROPOSED LABOR LEGISLATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a memorial of the International and National Trade and Labor Unions and Organization of Farmers, which, in the absence of objection, will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the memorial as follows:

LABOR'S PROTEST TO CONGRESS.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1908.

We, the official representatives of the national and international trade and labor unions and organization of farmers, in national conference assembled, in the District of Columbia, for the purpose of considering and taking action deemed necessary to meet the situation in which the working people of our country are placed by recent decisions of the courts, now appear before Congress to voice the earnest and emphatic protest of the workers of the country against the indifference, if not actual hostility, which Congress has shown toward the reasonable and righteous measures proposed by the workers for the safeguarding of their rights and interests.

In the name of labor we now urge upon Congress the necessity for immediate action for relief from the most grave and momentous situation which has ever confronted the working people of this country. This crisis has been brought about by the application by the Supreme Court of the United States of the Sherman antitrust law to the workers both organized and in their individual capacity.

Labor and the people generally look askance at the invasion of the court upon the prerogatives of the lawmaking and executive departments of our Government.

The workers feel that Congress itself must share our chagrin and sense of injustice when the courts exhibit an utter disregard for the real intent and purpose of laws enacted to safeguard and protect the workers in the exercise of their normal activities. There is something ominous in the ironic manner in which the courts guarantee to workers:

The "right" to be maimed and killed without liability to the employer;

The "right" to be discharged for belonging to a union;

The "right" to work as many hours as employers please and under any conditions which they may impose.

Labor is justly indignant at the bestowal or guaranteeing of these worthless and academic "rights" by the courts, which in the same breath deny and forbid to the workers the practical and necessary protection of laws which define and safeguard their rights and liberties and the exercise of them individually or in association.

The most recent perversion of the intent of a law by the judiciary has been the Supreme Court decision in the hatters' case, by which the Sherman antitrust law has been made to apply to labor, although it was an accepted fact that Congress did not intend the law to so apply and might even have specifically exempted labor but for the fear that the Supreme Court might construe such an affirmative provision to be unconstitutional.

The workers earnestly urge Congress to cooperate with them in the upbuilding and educating of a public sentiment which will confine the judiciary to its proper function, which is certainly not that of placing a construction upon a law the very opposite of the plain intent of Congress, thus rendering worthless even the very moderate efforts which Congress has so far put forth to define the status of the most important, numerous, and patriotic of our people—the wage-workers, the producers of all wealth.

We contend that equity, power, and jurisdiction, discretionary government by the judiciary for well-defined purposes and within specific limitations, granted to the courts by the Constitution, has been so extended that it is invading the field of government by law and endangering individual liberty.

As government by equity, personal government, advances, republican government, government by law, recedes.

We favor enactment of laws which shall restrict the jurisdiction of courts of equity to property and property rights and shall so define property and property rights that neither directly nor indirectly shall there be held to be any property or property rights in the labor or labor power of any person or persons.

The feeling of restless apprehension with which the workers view the apathy of Congress is accentuated by the recent decision of the Supreme Court.

By the wrongful application of the injunction by the lower courts the workers have been forbidden the right of free press and free speech, and the Supreme Court in the hatters' case, while not directly prohibiting the exercise of these rights, yet so applies the Sherman law to labor that acts involving the use of free press and free speech, and hitherto assumed to be lawful, now become evidence upon which triple damages may be collected and fine and imprisonment added as a part of the penalty.

Indeed, the decision goes so far as to hold the agreements of unions with employers to maintain industrial peace to be "conspiracies" and the evidence of unlawful combinations in restraint of trade and commerce, thus effectually throttling labor by penalizing as criminal the exercise of its normal, peaceful rights and activities. The fact that these acts are, in reality, making for the uplift and the betterment of civilization as a whole does not seem to be understood or appreciated by the courts. The workers hope for a broader and more intelligent appreciation from Congress.

It is not necessary here to enter into a detailed review of this decision.

The workers ask from Congress the relief which it alone can give from the injustice which will surely result from the literal enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law as interpreted by this decision. The speedy enactment of labor's proposed amendment to the Sherman antitrust law will do much to restore the rights from which the toilers have been shorn.

We submit for consideration, and trust the same will be enacted, two provisions amendatory of the Sherman antitrust law, which originally were a part of the bill during the stages of its consideration by the Senate and before its final passage, and which are substantially as follows:

That nothing in said act (Sherman antitrust law) or in this act is intended, nor shall any provision thereof hereafter be enforced, so as to apply to organizations or associations not for profit and without capital stock, nor to the members of such organizations or associations.

That nothing in said act (Sherman antitrust law) or in this act is intended, nor shall any provision thereof hereafter be enforced so as to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture, made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

It is clearly an unwarranted assumption on the part of the courts or others to place the voluntary associations of the workers in the same category as trusts and corporations owning stock and organized for profit.

On the one hand we have the trusts and corporations dealing with purely material things and mostly with the inanimate products of labor; on the other hand there are workers, whose labor power is part of their very life and being and which can not be differentiated from their ownership in and of themselves.

The effort to categorically place the workers in the same position as those who deal in the products of labor of others is the failure to discern between things and man.

It is often flippantly averred that labor is a commodity, but modern civilization has clearly and sharply drawn the line between a bushel of coal, a side of pork, and the soul of a human, breathing, living man.

The enactment of the legislation which we ask will tend to so define and safeguard the rights of the workers of to-day and those who will come after them that they may hope to continue to enjoy the blessings of a free country as intended by the founders of our Government.

In the relief asked for in the proposed amendment to the Sherman antitrust law which we present to Congress, labor asks for no special privileges and no exemption from the treatment which any law-abiding citizen might hope to receive in a free country.

Indeed, the present Parliament of Great Britain, at its session in December, 1906, enacted into law what is known as the "trades dispute act." It is brief, and we therefore quote its provisions in full:

"1. It shall be lawful for any person or persons, acting either on their own behalf or on behalf of a trade union or other association of individuals, registered or unregistered, in contemplation of or during the continuance of any trade dispute, to attend for any of the following purposes at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on his business or happens to be—

"(1) For the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information.

"(2) For the purpose of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

"2. An agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be ground for an action if such act when committed by one person would not be ground for an action.

"3. An action shall not be brought against a trade union or other association aforesaid for the recovery of damage sustained by any person or persons by reason of the action of a member or members of such trade union or other association aforesaid."

We submit that if such relief from the onerous conditions brought about by the Taff-Vale decision of the highest court of Great Britain can be enacted by a monarchical government, there ought to be no hesitancy in conceding it in our own Republic.

The unions of labor aim to improve the standard of life; to uproot ignorance and foster education; to install character, manhood, and an independent spirit among our people; to bring about a recognition of the interdependence of man upon his fellow-man. We aim to establish a normal work day; to take the children from the factory and workshop and give them the opportunity of the schools, the home, and the playground. In a word, our unions strive to lighten toil, educate their members, make their homes more cheerful, and in every way contribute an earnest effort toward making life the better worth living. To achieve these praiseworthy ends we believe that all honorable and lawful means are justifiable and commendable and should receive the sympathetic support of every right-thinking American.

Labor asks only for justice. It asks that it be not victimized and penalized under laws never intended to apply to it.

We hope for a prompt recognition on the part of Congress of the wage-workers' very reasonable and moderate insistence in this important matter.

In addition, the other most important measures which labor urges are:

The bill to regulate and limit the issuance of injunctions—Pearre bill.

Employers' liability bill.

The bill extending the application of the eight-hour law to all Government employees and those employed upon work for the Government, whether by contractors or subcontractors.

There are other measures pending which we regard as important, but we feel especially justified in urging the passage of those mentioned, because they have been before Congress for several sessions and upon which extended hearings have been had before committees, every interest concerned having had ample opportunity to present arguments, and there is no good reason why action should longer be deferred by Congress.

We come to Congress hoping for a prompt and adequate remedy for the grievances of which we justly complain. The psychological moment has arrived for a total change of governmental policy toward the workers; to permit it to pass may be to invite disaster even to our national life.

In this frank statement of its grievances the attitude of labor should not be misinterpreted, nor should it be held as wanting in respect for our highest lawmaking body.

That the workers, while smarting under a most keen sense of injustice and neglect, turn first to Congress for a remedy, shows how greatly they still trust in the power and willingness of this branch of the Government to restore, safeguard, and protect their rights.

Labor proposes to aid in this work by exercising its utmost political and industrial activity, its moral and social influence, in order that the interests of the masses may be represented in Congress by those who are pledged to do justice to labor and to all our people, not to promote the special interests of those who would injure the whole body politic by crippling and enslaving the toilers.

Labor is most hopeful that Congress will appreciate the gravity of the situation which we have endeavored to present. The workers trust that Congress will shake off the apathy which has heretofore characterized it on this subject and perform a beneficent social service for the whole people by enacting such legislation as will restore confidence among the workers that their needs as law-abiding citizens will be heeded.

Only by such action will a crisis be averted. There must be something more substantial than fair promises. The present feeling of widespread apprehension among the workers of our country becomes more acute every day. The desire for decisive action becomes more intense.

While it is true that there is no legal appeal from a Supreme Court decision, yet we believe Congress can and should enact such further legislation as will more clearly define the rights and liberties of the workers.

Should labor's petition for the righting of the wrongs which have been imposed upon it and the remedying of injustice done to it pass unheeded by Congress and those who administer the affairs of our Government, then upon those who have failed to do their duty and not upon the workers will rest the responsibility.

The labor union is a natural, rational, and inevitable outgrowth of our modern industrial conditions. To outlaw the union in the exercise of its normal activities for the protection and advancement of labor and the advancement of society in general is to do a tremendous injury to all people.

The repression of right and natural activities is bound to finally break forth in violent form of protest, especially among the more ignorant of the people, who will feel great bitterness if denied the consideration they have a right to expect at the hands of Congress.

As the authorized representatives of the organized wage-earners of our country, we present to you in the most conservative and earnest manner that protest against the wrongs which they have to endure, and some of the rights and relief to which they are justly entitled. There is not a wrong for which we seek redress, or a right to which we aspire which does not or will not be equally shared by all the workers—by all the people.

While no Member of Congress or party can evade or avoid his or their own individual or party share of responsibility, we aver that the party in power must, and will, by labor and its sympathizers, be held primarily responsible for the failure to give the prompt, full, and effective Congressional relief we know to be within its power.

We come to you not as political partisans, whether Republican, Democratic, or other, but as representatives of the wageworkers of our country, whose rights, interests, and welfare have been jeopardized and flagrantly, woefully disregarded and neglected. We come to you because you are responsible for legislation or the failure of legislation. If these, or new questions, are unsettled and any other political party becomes responsible for legislation, we shall press home upon its Representatives and hold them responsible, equally as we now must hold you.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURROWS. It is an important memorial and I ask that it be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. In connection with the request made by the Senator from Michigan, I ask that 1,000 additional copies be printed. The usual edition is small, and as there will doubtless be many calls for the document, I think we ought to have some extra copies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that 1,000 copies in addition to the regular number be printed. In the absence of objection it is so ordered.

DEATH OF THE KING AND THE CROWN PRINCE OF PORTUGAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a copy of a note from the Portuguese minister, conveying to the Senate the sincere thanks of His Majesty the King of Portugal for the sympathetic resolutions adopted by the Senate relative to the assassination of the King and Crown Prince of Portugal, which, with the accompanying paper, was, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of the Trustees of Hennegars Chapel Methodist Episcopal Church, of Dunlap, Tenn., v. The United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4046) to authorize the cutting of timber and the preservation of the forests on certain lands reserved for Indian reservations in the State of Wisconsin, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 16268) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 4112) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. COUSINS, Mr. LANDIS, and Mr. HOWARD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 626. An act authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and granting the same and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through Three Tree Point Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Grays Harbor and Columbia River Railway Company, its successors and assigns;

S. 4377. An act to carry into effect the international convention of December 21, 1904, relating to the exemption in time of war hospital ships from dues and taxes on vessels;

S. 5254. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. R. 69. Joint resolution granting authority for the use of certain balances of appropriations for the Light-House Establishment to be available for certain named purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the congregation of the Baptist Church of Lamoille, Ill., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following amendment to the Constitution of the United States has been introduced in the Senate by Senator HANSBROUGH, of North Dakota:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"SECTION 1. Neither polygamy nor polygamous cohabitation shall exist in the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction.

"SEC. 2. The practice of polygamy or polygamous cohabitation within the bounds of a State or Territory of the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction shall be treated as a crime against the United States.

"SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation."

Resolved, That we, the members of the Baptist Church and congregation of Lamoille, Ill., respectfully urge upon the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring) to take the necessary steps immediately for submitting this amendment to the respective States for ratification.

Resolved, That we most earnestly and respectfully request Senators A. J. HOPKINS and SHELBY M. CULLOM to support this measure in the Senate.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be duly signed by our pastor and clerk and forwarded at once to Senators A. J. HOPKINS and SHELBY M. CULLOM.

Unanimously approved March 15, 1908.

O. P. BESTOR,
Pastor Lamoille Baptist Church.

DELLA S. KELSEY,
Church Clerk.
